

BRITISH SAILORS HAULING A NAVAL GUN INTO POSITION NEAR COLENSO.

Some of the Queen's bluejackets are engaging in such novel work at present in South Africa that they are doubtless compelled now and then to rub their eyes to see if they are awake. They are far from their ships and are doing all their cruising on land. Many of the big guns of their warships have been taken ashore and rudely mounted upon hastily improvised wheels. The blue jackets are compelled to haul these ponderous guns to the tops of steep kopjes, from which they shell the clusive Boer. The accompanying cut, which is from a photograph, shows a detachment of the naval brigadle fortifying a Poetic Pessimism.—Once upon time a poet, with much sorrow, contemplated a farmer of to-day. "Ah the man with the hoe!" sighed the poet, dejectedly. "Hoe!" exclaimed farmer of to-day. "Don't you know the difference between a hoe and a golf club?" Here he lofted, dignifiedly, and landed on the green. This fable teaches that the poet often takes a too gloomy view of things.
