Where Marriage Is Least Popular. Marriage is least popular in the peninsula of Athos, in the Ægean Sea, in European Turkey, because in that community, which enjoys complete autonomy, subject to paying the Turkish Government an annual tribute, no marriage ever takes place. They never allow any woman in their territory and carry their objection to marriage and the opposite sex to such an extent that no female, even of the lower animals, is ever permitted to enter the peninsula. The population, about 6000, all monks, form a kind of monastic republic, consisting of 20 large monasteries besides numerous hermitages and chapels. The whole community is governed by an administrative body of four presidents, one of whom is styled "First Man of Athos," and a representative body called the Holy Synod, consisting of twenty members, one from each monastery. Among countries of the world generally marriage appears to be least popular in Chili, which country has a larger proportion of its population unmarried than in any other country. Taking Europe, marriage appears the least popular in Portugal, where, in every 1000 inhabitants, 310 are married, 628 are single and 62 are widowed. In Hungary, marriage would appear to be more popular than in any other country. Out of every 1000 of the population 407 are married, 532 are single and 61 are widowed. enjoys complete autonomy, subject to pay-

The Hungarian Sanitary Board has petitioned the Home Minister to forbid the wearing of this pernicious sweeping apparatus by ladies in the public streets. The prohibition has been actually carried out in Meran, but in the neighboring kingdom the minister has not yet found the courage to take up the gauntlet. It seems that nothing short of an international petition to the Paris dressmakers, as the leaders of fashion in reminine dress, says a Vienua correspondent, will rince the women of these countries that by ires, says a Vienna correspondent, will suffice to keep our lungs from being infected with the germs of disease contained in the dust of the public thorougfares.
