SIZE of a Hedge Sparrow; length five inches. Bill and legs brown; irides hazel; head and neck violet; round the eyes red; the upper part of the back, and scapulars yellow green; lower part, rump, and all beneath dull red; lesser wing coverts violet brown, with a tinge of red; the greater of a dull greenish colour; quills brown, the edges of some greenish, of others red; tail brown, the two middle feathers incline to red, and the others margined outwardly with the same. The female is dull green above, and yellow green beneath; quills brown, fringed with green; the tail also brown and green mixed.

This bird varies exceedingly, and said not to get the full plumage till the third year: in the first, both sexes are brown; the male gains the blue head the second, but the rest of the plumage is blue green: wings and tail brown, edged with blue green: the female, at that time, inclines greatly to blue, and as they moult twice in a year, it is not wonderful, that scarcely any two birds are quite alike.
