GAS FROM CORNBLOSS

(New York Herald.)
Beatrice, Neb., Sept. 27—There has been found a new use for the humble corn cob and the pile of straw in field or barnyard. Experiment has revealed a method of transforming the corn cob into a coke that is hotter by far than the ordinary coke.

A Cleveland chemist has had a great invention. As a result of his experiment he has discovered a method of transforming the corn cob into a coke that is hotter by far than the ordinary coke.

It was Mr. J. Russell Coutts' innate love of a bonfire that indirectly led him to make what gas men say is certain to revolutionize the industry in those sections remote from the gas coal supply and adjacent to the wheat and corn belt. Something more than a year ago he was visiting a friend in Canada.

The friend owned a big ranch. He had just completed threshing, and the great stack of straw that remained had no market that justified the expense of loading and hauling. So he followed the usual custom of burning it. Mr. Coutts was given the job of lighting the straw stack. He was glad of the opportunity. He noticed that immediately above the burning material hovered a familiar blue flame. His nostrils were assailed by the sickly sweet fumes of carbon monoxide, a constituent of water gas.

Then the great idea came. Why was it not possible to produce for commercial use gas from straw? The more he thought about it and the more he experimented, the more evident it became that he had found something valuable. Being such a simple proposition, however, he feared that possibly it was an old idea, abandoned before his day.

Business called him to England within a short time, and there he put in several months delving in scientific libraries of Oxford and Cambridge. Thorp, the great English chemist, to whom he made known his mission, assured him that it was something new. Returning to America, he consulted with Dr. Chandler, of Columbia, one of the greatest agricultural chemists upon something valuable, and in his enthusiasm he aided in making elaborate laboratory tests. They proved to be successful.

Manifestly, as straw, cobs and cornstalks were to be employed as fuel, it was advisable to get into the centre of the grain belt. This led to the selection of Nebraska as the scene of experiment. Practical process of manufacture is simple. Practical process of manufacture is simple. Practical process of manufacture is simple.

Instead of shoveling coal into the retorts, bales of straw or cobs are dumped in. At the beginning the retort was heated with coal, but after the cobs were found to produce a better coke, the use of coal was discontinued. When the retorts get well heated the gas is thrown off, collected, purified and placed in reservoirs or holders.

Three per cent. of the original weight of the straw, cobs or stalks remain after the gas is extracted, and this is used to heat the benches or feed the boilers. This is shown—using raw material to make the process self-sustaining, and eliminates any necessity for fuel.

In heating power the corn gas runs as
