is berives baLIFE

In gorgeous beauty over the hills,
The light of morning broke.
While woodland birds with joyous trills,
Their matin song awoke.
Bright of or the earth the sunlight felt,
And tipped with gold the wave,
While flowereds fair through wood and
Their breath of inceuse gave.

O, darkly lowered the angry sky, As mountide hours drew near,
The waiting wind swept madly by,
With cadence wild and drear.
No song of birds swelled full and iree,
But deep the thunder's tone,
And where the amlight danced in gles,
The lightning flasted alone.

And evening came are evin, are all As once in Eden fair,
Ere sorrow's blight or anglet of ill
Had darkly entered there,
A sound of waters, sweet and low,
Came on the passing gale,
And earth, forgetting all her woe,
Stept in the startight pale

yeary ones! whose morning
Hath changed to storm senous.
Suk not beneath the tempest might,
The evening course, with quiet stars,
Of hore, and peace, and love—
No breath of earthly sorrow mans
"Our Father's house above."

BY AND BY.

A school-boy sits with a troubled took, if
And a frown is on his brow.
He has pondered long o'er that tiresome be
He intirid and weary now.
But quickly a glad and joyous light
Beams forth from his dark, bright ey;
He thinks of the future with promise bright,
And whispers, "By sind by."

A youth is standing with folding.

And whispers, "By and by."

A youth is standing with folding arm,
And p brow with thought o'ercast
Ilis check is flowhed with life-blood warms,
And his heart beats high and fast.
And noble purpose, and stern resolve
Are stamped on his forchead high,
And plorious thoughts in his breast resolve.
As he murmure, "By and by."

And manhood, with labor and busy Is wearing his life away; Tol. constant toil, from year to year,
No quiet by night or day.
With anxious brow and aching heart,
He heaves the deep-drawn wigh;
But he looks with joy the seming rest
And whispers, " By and by."

And age leans weary on Lie staff, And age is author trun;
Gone are life's fleet and transient joys,
Set is life's morning sun.
Yet falters not the weary hand,
Bright is the sunken eye;
Heasees, by faith, the "better land,"
And murmurs, "By and by."

CORRESPONDENCE.

Editor of the Ingersoll Chronicle Six,—When it was found that the joinings were now secure, the Speculum metal and bed were again roldered together; this, however, was no ersy matter, and gave rise at frest to much annovance and loss of time. It was attempted to solder them by tinning the brass bed, and placing the Speculum on this with rosin interposed, then raising the temperature, and using slight pressure when the tin and rosin were fured. However, the latter becoming decomposed during the elevation of the temperature effectually prevented any union taking place. Sel Ammuniac Speak, Mrs. Mopple—or rather let me and rosin were fured. It was an undecided question.

Mrs. Lucretia Mopp'e seemed to all the Mrs. Lucretis Mopple seemed to an the boarders to be a very perfect pattern of propriety, though some thought she dressed rather richly for the wife of a man of moderate mens, and none thought her over-fond of Mr. Ajax Mopple, her legal lord and master. Mink, from the lour he first set his remorables eyes upon the charms of Mrs. Mopple, found that his pulse gained upon the clock about an hour a day more than was healthful, and concluding that he was in love with Mrs. Mopple, he determined to do his best, i. e., his worst.

Mink, Mopple, he determined to do his best, i. e., his worst.

Mink had been successfull in his attacks upon the female heart, and believed himself worthy of his name—Appollo. Hundreds had some fessed his coaxing ways, and very amisbly yielded without discretion. But Mink had been successfully an analysis of the successfully and analysis to bombard her successfully and analysis were delivered from his eyes.

His first shots were delivered from his eyes.

A killing pair—soon joined by discharges from the mortar of his mouth. Looks and words he plied with ceaseless nesiduity, till Mrs. Lucretia. Mopple became unmistakably aware that Mr. Apollo Mink coveted the domains of Ajax.

It gave her food for deep and varied thought. She confessed to herself a flat eving sensation in the region of the chest, whenever Mink led her, in the absence of Mopple, to the attentishment and cold herror of the tortured Mink, stood by, clapping her hands and laughing, and urging her hands and a warm pressure.
