Sometimes one publication of a "To Let" adv. is enough—sometimes it's half enough. Again it might need even more persistence—but, the important fact is that it WILL find the tenant.

No to use the classified ads. is to remain "old-fashioned" in a "new-fashioned" town.

AMUSEMENTS

NEW SHOW AT NICKEL For Friday and all day Saturday the Nickel has a bill of surprising merit. The big picture feature is another of those magnificent biograph dramas entitled "The Sealed Room," or the mystery of a secluded chamber. This is a tale of the middle ages, the scheme of a jealous king. As an offset to this strongly dramatic picture is "Little Darling," a comedia by biograph of the dainty, yet laughable type. A whole reel is devoted to the splitting story by the Selig Co. "My Wife's Gone to the Country, Hurrah," a film version of a rousing song of that title. Those who saw Selig's Mrs. Jones' Birthday early this week will like this picture even better. There will be additional films at the matinee. The Marchands will continue in their delightful rendering of "Il Trovatore" and "Lucia" selections and Pauline Barry's Dutch songs with wooden-shoe dances made a big hit yesterday. The Saturday matinee is going to be a hummer.

WOMEN COMPETE FOR AUCTIONEER'S JOB

Gave Specimens of Their Oratory on Rostrum Before Committee of Judges. LONDON, Sept. 10.—Twenty-two would-be women auctioneers displayed their qualifications before a committee of erratically elected judges at Olympia yesterday. They had been selected from 722 who applied for the post of auctioneer at the forthcoming Women of All Nations exhibition. Each auctioneer had three lots to dispose of within a time limit of five minutes. An electrified tea tray, a billiken, and a basket of biscuits were the articles. The first competitor to mount the rostrum was Miss Madelon, of Southampton, who claims to be the only original woman auctioneer. She worked up her audience to a fine frenzy of applause, and managed to dispose of the tea tray when time was called. Miss Griffith, of Northampton, was

THE LAUGHTER OF LIFE

A NOVEL AND A VERY INTERESTING ONE Copyright 1908 By MARIA ALBANESI

To Brian Keston had come of this celebrated library had conveyed naturally a great deal, but till his doubts, or if you want help, you will tell me so at once. From what I know of your training, however—I mean from what Mr. Letbridge has told me of the work which you have been doing—I feel pretty well assured that you will not fall easily. Still, I understand your feelings, Mr. Keston; indeed I hardly realize myself as yet that I have been able to possess myself of all these wonderful things. I am afraid this little piece is scarcely worthy of such a collection, but for the time being I must board it here.

But Keston had no fault to find with the rooms which had been built as an extension to the old shop for library purposes; indeed, to the young man the house, though not sumptuous or grand, was indeed almost too luxurious when contrasted with the shabby, dingy place in which he had lived for so many years.

With nothing, however, was he more charmed than with the mistress of Crowder Chase. There was about Bertha Heronworth a sweetness and a serenity, and an unforced graciousness which won the young man's heart. Keston felt, too, that her welcome was absolutely sincere, and that he would find in her a friend as well as a fellow-worker. Miss Heronworth did all in her power to confirm this delightful impression. "I want you to feel quite at home, Mr. Keston," she had said, "but you must not be surprised if you will find me a little stiff and formal. I will try to be as comfortable as I can, but at the same time I think at any time interested in what you say. And please remember you are going to let me help you whenever you are in need of me. I can remember anything."

"You are rich already," Brian Keston had said as he walked round the library and had glanced at the contents of the shelves.

"I have very little that is rare here, save, perhaps, these old books," she had replied, "but I have a very fine preservation of the first English Bible, the Coverdale, 1535. My father,

I think, would have taken up books as his hobby in his real career had he lived, as it was he started buying first editions, and those, of course, will become more valuable as time passes."

Though he fell quickly into the duties required of him a sense of reality always pressed on Brian Keston wherever he was alone in the charming sitting-room which had been allotted to him, and on this morning after he had bicycled away from Drusilla he stood a moment looking about him with a nervous feeling which was almost irritation.

"Letbridge was right," he said to himself with that touch of grimness which he had been living in and about that book-shop for several years; he had slept in a shabby kind of attic, he had eaten in an underground apartment. Nothing but enthusiasm for the work, nothing but that overpowering interest, that kind of obsession which came to him little by little for the books, the wondrous, silent revelations of other men's brains, would have kept him so long in that little shabby shop in that unimportant town, but chance had put a certain kind of power in his hands. The man whom he had served was old and sick. Little by little the business had been left entirely in Keston's care and he had proved a splendid administrator. He had bought and sold on his own initiative and the little shop had prospered. Probably if death had not come to end the old man's sufferings Keston would have stayed on indefinitely; but the relatives had resolved to sell the business. The young man found himself practically adrift after fifteen years' hard labor and real loyalty. He had not, it is true, left the old shop immediately, but had agreed to remain until the business had changed hands, and he had been waiting for the recommendation to Mr. Letbridge, the one and only person in the world whom he called friend, or who took any interest in him.

The two men had dined in London the night before Keston's arrival at Crowder Chase.

"It is a real satisfaction for me to bring you and Miss Heronworth together," Stephen Letbridge had said. "There are few people for whom I have the respect and admiration that I have for Bertha Heronworth. I suppose if all her property were realized she would be worth very penny of two millions, yet she is the most modest, the simplest, the kindest and most charitable creature in the world. She owns the largest share of the Heronworth shipping firm up North."

Mr. Letbridge had said nothing about the younger Miss Heronworth, but this did not appear to him to be a person who would be of importance to anybody but herself, and probably her sister. She was the kind of flighty, frivolous, pretty creature whose intention it was to dazzle, but who could make no claim upon the intelligence or real sympathies of those about her; so he lightly dismissed the girl at first, but gradually he was beginning to think differently. Drusilla had a trick of making strange claims, instead of exacting not merely attention but respect. She was very intelligent in his mind now as she stood tuning with a frown on his brow. He was thinking of her, not as she had been just before he had left her, but as she had looked when they had stood at the door of the cottage hospital, and she had entreated so earnestly to be allowed to see Phil Rogers. There had been something in her face, something more than a glimpse of a nature which could possess depths of emotional feeling strangely at variance with her favorite flippancy. Assuredly she was not to be judged casually. As he stood frowning and musing, Bob, the fox terrier, sat at his feet and looked up at him. Keston had hardly realized that the dog had followed him, and as he stooped to greet the animal his face took on a different expression. Bob was evidently determined to be very friendly. He wagged his tail, and he sneezed, and he stretched himself, and he stood up on his hind legs, and leaped affectionately against the young man, and as he caressed the smooth head of the dog and responded to his affectionate grating there came back to Brian Keston's remembrance visions of days long before, when he had lived in just such an atmosphere as this, and had possessed just such a dog as Bob for his constant companion and friend. It was long since memory had swept him back so far; he never encouraged himself to dwell on things which had happened when he had been a boy, for far away as those things were, they made the ground-work for that bitterness which had done its best to spoil a fine nature.

Drusilla missed Mr. Keston when they were seated at luncheon. "She still wore her hat, but had discarded her thick coat, and in the front of her silk blouse she had pinned the bunch of red berries which Brian Keston had picked for her with so much difficulty. Lord Carlingford proved a most agreeable acquisition to the small luncheon party. Miss Heronworth had expressed real pleasure at meeting him; nevertheless, there was a little pang in her heart as she glanced now and again at the two young people, who laughed and talked so lightly one to another.

Uncle Walt The Poetic Philosopher
I stood on the bridge at midnight, and gazed on the sleeping town; and the moon rose over the court house—there was nothing to hold it down. I looked at the weary river, that bubbles and twists and squirms; I thought of the folks who drink it, and fill their insides with germs. How often, O how often, when I'd settled the water rent, had I found that the blamed collector had left me without a cent! How often, O how often, in the days that were gone by, had I yearned for a drink of water, and found all the hydrants dry! So my heart was hot and restless, and my life was full of care, and I stood on the bridge at midnight, where the cops couldn't hear me swear. And the bridge, it collapsed beneath me, and fell with an awful din; for the graters who built that structure had fashioned the piers of sin.

quite the most business-like of all. She hustled into the rostrum and worked up the bidding at lightning speed, and she was the first to remember that it was necessary to ask for the name of the buyer.

But the most accomplished extorter of bids was Miss Hatton, of Stratham. Under her hands the billiken became something to be coveted beyond riches. At last, Bob, billiken and tray were knocked down for the last time, and the votes were counted. The result was: Miss Hatton, 27 votes; Miss Madelon, 19 votes; and Miss Griffith, 15 votes.

Miss Mercy Hutton will therefore be the official woman auctioneer at Olympia, and she will have a commission of 10 per cent on all she sells.

The general candidate goes forth. "When comes the autumn weather, Today he stings you by the hand And later altogether."

Just—"Have a good time on your vacation!" "Yes, indeed, I found a place where you didn't hear a word about golf or yachts or automobiles." "Just—"Goodness! What were you called for?"
