Editor's Talk

NEW series of gentle humour, blended with practical philosophy, begins in this issue. The title is "Laughing at Life." The author is George Edgar, a well-known English writer, who has caught the genial spirit of Oliver Wendell Holmes, and has succeeded in doing for the reader what the title indicates. The laughter may not be boisterous or hysterical. It will rather be that genial, quiet kind of mirth which, in a time of violent unrest the world over, leaves the reader with no reaction, but merely soothed as by gentle music.

The various divisions into which the author has grouped his observations and sketches are: The Peacock Stage, Love's Fragrant Illusion, The Engaged Girl, The Monotony of Weddings, The Golden Year, The First Baby, The Place for the Sun, and After All-

These form a progressive cycle of good humour, co-extensive with the whole romantic period of life and what comes after it. They will run in a series of groups and will have the sustained interest of a first-class serial story.
