Falcons sold on black market

(EN) - Laws protecting endangered species can sometimes backfire. For example, the Peregrine Falcon may be endangered, but that doesn't stop falcon fanciers from Europe and the Middle East from paying high prices for the rare birds. At present young falcons are selling for as much as $2,000 on the black market.

What's worse, a spokesperson for the Ontario Natural Resources Ministry in Canada says, is that the price for the birds may go up to as much as $6,000 each. And since each nest of young falcons usually has five birds, that means a nest-robber could pick up $30,000 from ripping off just one nest.

The government of Ontario just passed a law protecting Peregrine Falcons--and three other species of birds and snakes--within the province. But there's no way of knowing whether the new legislation will help the animals or increase incentive for poaching.
