Effect of Restriction on Issues Being Matched Ver ward in Striking Editorials In English

(By W. E. DOWDING.)

London, January 26.—(By mail.)—A curious conflict of opinion has arisen over the decision of the British Treasury to restrict the freedom of capital issues during the war. A great commercial organ like the Manchester Guardian thinks that the restriction is directly opposed to the interests of industry. It points out that capital will lie idle, and that this is not good for the country. Perhaps the paper is right. But the plain intention of the Government is to keep capital available for short call, in order that it may be used for military purposes; and it is also intended to check the re-opening of the Stock Exchange, In the City it was received with practically unanimous approval, for its was recognized that a strict organization of all our financial resources is one of the surest means of bringing the war to a speedy conclusion. At the same time it is felt that the measure, however, salutary may have important developments, and its possible consequences were much discussed in bank parlours and in "the House" all through the week. It is never one or two points opinions were almost agreed. In the first place the new conditions will accentuate the money plethora.
