"There is no writer of the age of George the Third, that, for force and purity of diction, can be compared to Burke, and none whose opinions, on the political changes of the period, are entitled to greater respect. The leading men of all parties are fully aware of this, and to them the 20 vols. which his works consist of, are an inexhaustible storehouse, to be made available, on all occasions, in the Debates of Parliament, the Hustings, or Public Meetings. To gather the most precious gems of thought out of this mass into a small compass, to meet the wants of the general reader, is the object of the present, judiciously selected, and well executed publication."
