Meteoric Career of Mr. Tod Sloan

Meteoric certainly has been the career of Tod Sloan, the one-time great American jockey, just ordered deported from England as an objectionable character, under the Defence-of-the-Realm Act. The time was when Sloan was acclaimed by thousands the pet of the elite of England's fashionable racing world, when fame rested on his head and riches poured into his lap. Great has been his fall in prestige when he finally finds himself ignobly ejected from the land which was the scene of his greatest triumphs.

Fred Archer and Tod Sloan were the two greatest jockeys ever seen by living racing men, in his career of nineteen years Archer rode 2748 winners. Sloan might have equaled this record, but his riding license was withheld by the Jockey Club fifteen years ago. Since then he has not ridden on an English race course. He was not "warned off"; he was simply advised not to apply for his riding license.

Sloan made the acquaintance of race horses in 1886, the year that Archer died. Archer was the greatest exponent of the old style of riding. Sloan discovered the new one and revolutionized racing.

In his book, "Tod Sloan, by Himself," the great American horseman tells how he discovered, quite by accident, the "monkey-on-the-stick" seat which made him famous.

One day, when going to the post on the Bay District track at San Francisco, Sloan's mount started to bolt. In trying to pull him up, Sloan got up out of the saddle and on to his neck. While he was doing the neck crouch, he noticed the animal's stride seemed to be freer, and he determined to put it into practice. He began to win races, and to the day of his enforced retirement Sloan always rode his races crouched like a monkey on the horse's neck.

During his first month in England, Sloan had 48 mounts, and won 21 races. His earnings, after paying expenses, were $10,000. Going to Monte Carlo, he played roulette twice a day for six days, and won $12,000. But money slipped thru his hands like water. On one occasion in America he chartered a special train to take a few friends to a ball. And on a journey of any length he often had with him as many as eighteen pairs of shoes. He had a tiny foot, the size of his shoes being one and a half. Among the many women he knew only two could wear them.

Sloan was introduced to the late King Edward, when he was Prince of Wales, by Lord William Beresford, for whom he rode. Later, during one of their many conversations, the prince told the jockey that he was no gambler, and that as a rule he hardly ever had more than $125 on a horse, but that he used to make an exception and have a couple of hundred pounds on anything Sloan was riding, and he (the jockey) thought would win.

Once, at Newmarket, Sloan was on his way to mount, when the prince beckoned him, and, naming his mount, Encombe, asked if he thought he would win.

Sloan replied in the affirmative, but Lord Marcus Beresford, who was near, said his horse would beat Encombe, and an animal named Dundonald would beat both.

"Never you mind what Lord Marcus says, your royal highness," said Sloan, boldly. "You can be a plunger here and have a bit on me."

After a desperate finish, Sloan's mount won, and the prince told the jockey he had taken his tip and put $1000 on Encombe at 7 to 2 against, thus winning $3500.

Sloan will ever regret that when he was introduced to King George at Newmarket, he stood talking two minutes, and clean forgot to remove his cap.

For the late King Edward Sloan rode many winners, and in 1900 his majesty, then, of course, Prince of Wales, offered thru Lord Marcus Beresford a retaining fee of 6000 guineas to have first call on his services for the season of 1901. The English racecourse stewards, however, prevented him from fulfilling the contract, which had been accepted on the spot.

Meanwhile, Sloan had been simply coining money. On Sept. 30, 1898, at Newmarket, he rode five winners in one afternoon. In that season when he rode 42 winners in three months, he had $50,000 saved. In 1899 he had $185,000 in one bank, besides some good investments in New York and California. But the gambling instinct was abnormally developed. He would lose $1750 over a game at nap and win $10,000 at a sitting at roulette. It was gambling on horses, which is against the Jockey Club rules, that terminated his career on the English turf.

He won a race in France on a horse called Codoman. For this he received a present of $3500. Sloan thought Codoman could win the Cambridgeshire and backed his mount, contrary to regulations, heavily. Codoman was beaten; had he won, Sloan would have netted $330,000.

"After the Cambridgeshire," writes Sloan, "the stewards sent for me. I guessed what was coming. They told me it had come to their knowledge that I had some big bets on Codoman and also that I had been promised a present (running into four figures) by a certain gentleman if the horse won. I acknowledged both things at once . . . They reprimanded me. I went out to ride as usual, finishing up the week on Encombe, which, as I have said, I advised King Edward—then Prince of Wales—to back."
