Weight Corrections whom an article appeared in the Times yesterday, has given this paper some information which is of an extenuating character. It is true that Mr. Henwood has left the city and will probably not return, and that he left some debts behind. His friend states, however, that these are few in number and not large in the aggregate, and that Mr. Henwood left a list of them with a friend here and stated that he would send the money to pay them as soon as he could earn it. It is further pointed out that he paid several small bills the day he went away. It is admitted that he was a free spender of money, much too free or his own pocket, but it is said that he fully expected to make good in his business and was disappointed. The friend who gave the Times this information expressed the strongest confidence in the good intentions and personal honesty of Mr. Henwood.
