At any rate the donkeys have at last been admitted within the glass walk of the Crystal Palace. Skry-two owners of males and donkeys responded to the call of the Crystal Palace Company, and seventy-three animals were entered for competition, of which number only about large, but large enough to secure a good beginning, and to excite no little interest among various classes of the public. There were ladies in swarms, waxing enhusiastic over this "beauty" and that "pet"; there were old gentlemen who seemed to think they did the correct thing by prodding the brutes with sticks and umbrellas; but more enthusiastic than the ladies, more discriminating than the old gentlemen, and as naimerous as either, were the donkey owning class and their friends. Costermongers, Blackheath and Hampstead "proprietors," hawkers, it hose forms owners, seemed to the content of the donkey-owners as for the donkeys and the company, nor, judging by the donkey-owners as man of conveying ideas. But the best proof of this was farnished by the donkeys themselves. They were the owners of the property. On reading over the fish Manchester, and laws of that State, we notice that a bill was enacted last winter allowing any person to catch fish through the ice from Hampton pond on the last Thursday of each month. We would like to see them catch a few strings of suckers through the ice on the last Thursday of July or August for instance. necessary as a means of conveying ideas. But the best proof of this was furnished by the donkeys themselves. They were no abject specimens of a downtrodd not nece—no cringing slaves, constantly in dread of the lash. Rather were they, every donkey of them, bright-eyed, well-fed, vivacious and tractable, as animals should be when living under the law of kindness. That their masters set great store by them the catalogue made quite clear. Some donkeys were not for sale on any terms; others were priced at $2,500, while for very many more sums ranging from $100 to $500 were asked. Mr. George A. Sala wrote the introduction to the well-arranged catalogue, which showed donkeys that had been driven 220 miles in forty-eight hours, conveying four persons and their luggage. Among those winning the first first prizes was an old fellow of twenty-one that made thirty mile trips daily, and the first prize for English mares was taken by a frequenter of Billingsgate. The third was a vigorous little animal devoted to the dissemination of firewood over a route of thirty miles. Truly it is a new start for these little animals to be wearing wreaths of victory.

Mrs. Taylor affirms that within the past two years she purchased lottery tickets from Taylor & Co. on twelve different occasions, paying therefor sums varying from $30 to $2400—the entire payments amounting to $5250. It appears that luck was invariably against her, she never even winning a small amount by way of encouragement; but, as she says, the defendants, while condoing with her on her ill-luck, encouraged her by expressing the hope that it would change. These hopes were never realized, though she kept bravely on for a period of two years. Her hopes seem to have been most buoyant during the dreary days of December, for she then invested $1,-200, and subsequently $2400. At last she began to think the fates had, not played tairly with her, and she asked to have her investments restored to her. She thought Taylor & Co. ought at least to make an equitable division in her favor of the amount she had risked. This was refused, and availing herself of the statute against gambling, which gives to the A NEW NOVEL! HOWE MACHINES! the defendants. Mrs. Taylor affirms that WHOLESALE PRICES!
