A Spanish Beauty

The letters swam in a blood-red mist before his eyes. Here and there he missed a word, a line, a whole paragraph. The paper contained but a brief summary of the trial. His eyes went mechanically over the familiar lines.

"Perhaps," said the paper, "within the memory of man our town has never been so convulsed with astonishment and horror as it has been by the late murder and subsequent arrest. The decased, Kathleen O'Neal, was so well known, so universally beloved, so fair, so young, so full of promise, that her sad, untimely end has sent a thrill of grief and dismay to the coldest heart. The same may be said of the prisoner. High-born, beloved by all who knew him, the gentlest of human creatures, it seemed impossible to connect his name with that of murder. And yet he has been found guilty. He entered the crowded court room to-day with his usual dauntless, haughty manner. He had grown extremely pale and thin, but his eagle's eye glanced over the crowd with all the pride and fire of his proud and fiery race. 'Not guilty!' he responded in a voice that rang clear and high; and from the time he took his seat awhile, and then left, saying he would go in search of her. Lord Roderick came about two o'clock, looking very pale and excited, and told me he had found Kathleen drowned—her body floating in the boundary stream. Morgan and O'Moore carried her home. Three weeks after the inquest, rummaging about among her things. I found a note hidden away in her room, in the writing of the prisoner, appointwith all the pride and tire or his proud and fiery race. 'Not guilty!' he responded in a voice that rang clear and high; and from the time he took his seat within the dock until the time he was led away, his face never betrayed one trace of any emotion whatever. Even when the verdict was returned, not a nusely moved even when he stood un. when the verdict was returned, not a nuscle moved; even when he stood up and listened to the solemn sentence of death, the marble-like rigidity of his face, with the calm, courtly grace of a prince, he was the sole unmoved person in the whole assemblage.

"Only once did he betray any emotion—when the Lady Inez d'Alvarez fell fainting from her seat—and even then it was but momentary. As he was being led back to prison, he turned to his friend, Sir Owen Fitzgerald, and held out his hand.

"Testimony of Morgan:

"I am an Englishman by birth, an attorney by profession, and a resident, by choice, of this town for the past five was my betrothed wife. We were to be married in a month, with the consent und approval of her father. I loved her learly, but I have every reason to believe she did not love me. Lord Roder-k Desmond was her lover—a fact well nown—and I have it from his own lips at the more than once promised at the more than once promised at the more than once promised threats of every examples. The deceased loved him passionately, I know, I also know she was intensely jealous, and once in my hearing, threatened to go up to the castle and compel the Lady Inez to resign all right to her lover. "He was mine before he was hers!" were her words. "He shall never marry ther! I could break off the match to morrow, if I liked!"

"I thought the words but the words but the more than once promised." years. I knew the deceased well; she was my betrothed wife. We were to be married in a month, with the consent and approval of her father. I loved her dearly, but I have every reason to believe she did not love me. Lord Roderick Desmond was her lover—a fact well known—and I have it from his own lips that he more than once promised her marriage. But from his first meeting with the Lady Inez d'Alvarez he neglected Kathleen. I pressed my suit—she rejected it, and failed away to a shadow. Then came the news of the engagement Then came the news of the engagement Then came the news of the engagement of Lord Roderick and the Lady Inez. It was I who told her, and she fell backward—not fainting, but very near it—in her seat. Then she started wildly up.

""He will not! he dare not!" she cried; "he could not be so base a vil-I am to be his wife-he has sworn and—oh, what will become of me if fails to keep his word?" 'I pacified her as well as I could, at she broke away from me, and ran a hysterical state to her room. I did see her again for some days; she shunned me persistently. One evening a little before dusk, strolling among th hills, I came near the spot called the Fairy Well. There I espied the prisoner sand the deceased, conversing very carnestly. She seemed to be weep sing—to be pleading passionately—he soothing and reasoning with her. I heard nothing they said; I was angry and jealous, and quitted the place. About an hour after, as I stood alone near the cottage of O'Neal, Kathleen came rapidly along. Her face was pale, her eyes red—she seemed to have been weeping. I called her, and she stopped. I asked her what Lord Rederick had said to her, and she answered me. "I would never know." I told her I loved her, and would endure this suspense no longer. She must either say yes or no, now and forever: she said yes, without a moment's hesitation. Her words were. "I will marry you whenever you like."

"Then she left me and entered the cottage. I did not follow her that night; and the deceased, conversing very earnestly. She seemed to be weep

"Then she left me and entered the cottage. I did not follow her that night: I came over next day and all was arranged. We were to be married in a month. She consented to everything I proposed, but she said little: she looked very gloomy indeed. Business kept me so occupied during the next two days that I found no leisure to visit her. Early on the morning of the third day I started for the cottage, my way way leading past the boundary stream. It is a solitary spot, so that I was rather surprised when I heard voices on the opposite bank. I looked across and saw among the alders the figure of a man and woman. I recognized the voice of Wand learning the meter of the cottage, my way way leading past the boundary stream. It is a solitary spot, so that I was rather surprised when I heard voices on the opposite bank. I looked across and saw among the alders the figure of a man and woman. I recognized the voice of Wand learning the look as she fell background the strength of the cottage. The deepest sympathy is felt everywhere for his noble father and the young lady so soon to have been his bride. The prisoner was nuiversally beloved. The paper dropped from the reader's hand, he bowed his face in his hards with a hollow groan.

Will I ever forget his face?" he said, unskily. prised when I heard voices on the opposite bank. I looked across and saw among the alders the figure of a man and woman. I recognized the voice of Kathleen, raised high and shrill at times—again broken and low. The words I could not catch. The man's face was hidden, but I felt positive it was Lord Roderick's. I could not cross the stream conveniently to confront them: besides, I knew what a fierce, reckless temper Lord Roderick's was at times. I passed on my way, very ill pleased, determined to await Kathleen at the cottage and demand an explanation. I found O'Neal in, and alone—did not know where his daughter was—said she had been gone over an hour. I waited, but she never returned. As noon drew near I started up, determined to go in search of her. On my way I met O'Moore the constable, and asked him to accompany me. I had a presentiment of something evil, I think. We went to the spot where I had a presentiment of something evil, I think. We went to the spot where I had seen them together, but they were not thre. Just then we heard a sort of cry or groan further down; we dashed through the trees, and the first sight we saw was the prisoner bending over the body of the deceased. She was quite dead. He looked confounded—stunned; I can not describe his look. I taxed him with the murder at once, and his answer was to khock me down. O'Moore asked him to go to the cottage and apprise her father, while we bore the body home." site bank. I looked across and saw among the alders the figure of a man and woman. powder, only you're too hang-dog looking for any honest ghost. Sit down and don't look so like the first murderer in a tragedy, if you can help it."
"I can't help it!" Morgan cried, with a bitter groan; "I feel as though I were going mad! Listen to that storm, Gerald Desmond! look at that lightning! It it not the weath of Heaven on us for the double murder done!"

it not the wrath of Heaven on us for the double murder done?"
"My good fellow, speak for yourself. I've done no murder—never mean to, if I can help it. A clever villain—and I pride myself on being at the top of the profession—never breaks laws." Now, I don't say that you are an artiful seoundrel enough, in the main, but there is so much of the bloodhound and bulldog in your nature that it will break out in spite of you. When you pitched your little Katharine neck and crop into the

"For God's sake, hush!" Morgan cried in a voice of agony, starting to his feet. "Walls have ears! Hush, hush, hush!" "It was a weakening on your part I should never have judged you capable of

"It was a weakening on your pair I should never have judged you capable of. I'm compounding with felony in concealing it, I don't deny; but then it's an ill wind that blows nobody good. I've saved your bulldog neck from the gallows, my worthy Mr. Morgan, and fixed the crime on another man. You ought to be immeasurably grateful to me instead of glowering at me over the candle like the 'Faust' Mephistopheles."

He lighted a cigar as he spoke, and sent a puff of smoke into the face of his companion. The trodden worm looked gloomily at him.

"You are a deeper-dyed villain than I am—for. you made me swear an innocent man's life away. He was your friend—your benefactor—your kinsman. How will you answer to God and man for this day's work?"

ing a meeting at the boundary stream at ten o'clock. I can swear to the pri-any emotion it was but momentary. As he was being led back to prison, he turned to his friend. Sir Owen Fitzgerald, and held out his hand.

"'Can you take it?" he said, with a smile. It is the hand of a convicted felon. The Desmonds have gone to death with "All is lost except honor" on their lips. With me, all is lost, even honor. Farewell, Owen. Don't come to see me; only remember—some day you will know I am innocent!"

"The evidence was purely circumstantial, but very crushing—especially that of William Morgan. We give a brief synopsis.

"Testimony of Morgan:

"I am an Englishman britorney by preference in the standard of the came hand in the seemed very agitated, very excited, but I thought that next and Kathleen hand in lovers, next lovers, lovers

"I thought the words but the empty threats of excitement, at the time, and paid no attention to them. I do remember half-haughingly putting Rory on his guard, and he looked more scriously uncasy than I had thought it possible for him to look on such a matter. Lady linez was very proud—a whisper of infidelity and she would have broken with him at once. The witness knew his cousin's handwriting. Yes—this note was his—he could swear to it."

"As Mr. Gerald Desmond descended from the witness stand," said the paper, "the prisoner looked at him with a long steady, reproachful gaze.

"And thou, Brutus!" he said: but Mr. Desmond seemed very much affected and shrank from that fixed look. He had given his evidence with the utmost reluctance throughout.

"The jury was gone some hours. The verdict was 'Guilty."

"When asked if he had any reason testony we sentence of death should not be show why sentence of death should not

"When asked if he had any reason to show why sentence of death should not be pronounced upon him, the prisoner an swered, very pale but very firmly:

The paper dropped from the reader's hand. He bowed his face in his hands with a hollow groan.

"Will I ever forget his face?" he said, huskily. "The look in his eyes as he turned them upon me last, will haunt me to my dying day. And she—that last, upward look as she fell backward into the river! Oh, God! t will drive me mad!"
