THE WRONG LETTER.
They were very happy. If they were not happy, who should be—who could expect to be in such a world as this? They were both young, both handsome, both in good health and strong—and they were man and woman and they were engaged to be married. The prospect of the young man, Graham Welwyn, was good. He was a young medical man, and had just obtained a very important and promising appointment in one of the English communities in China. The appointment was for five years, and at the end of that time something much better was expected to arise, an appointment in London itself perhaps. Katherine Shirley, who was engaged to him, would of course have to give up London for all that time, and this, it might be said, ought to be some source of regret to her. But in the first instance, she had a passion for seeing strange places, and in the next she had little or nothing to give up in leaving London.

Colonel Shirley, her father, had married a second time—after the death of Katherine's mother—and he died in about two years. Katherine was 16 years old when her mother died—and was not likely to forget her. She had no brothers or sisters. She had for the last two years been living under the direction of her stepmother, who was kind enough to her, but never quite warmed to her. Mrs. Shirley had always in her mind the idea that the girl resembled her intrusions into the household—which was perhaps true enough, although Katherine tried hard not to show it. For she had sense enough to know that a man still handsome like her father, apparently in the fullness of life's prime, would hardly be content to live on the mere income of a past love from the age of 45. However, all that question was now set at rest. Colonel Shirley died in his prime, and his daughter was left alone with her stepmother. Therefore it was no great grief to her to have to leave England for five years in company with the man to whom she was to be married—the man whom she dearly loved. As to giving up London—why, she was now only 20 years old—and when she came back with her husband after their amusing exile in China she would still be only about 25. Young people get used up very soon now, it would seem, but still there must be considerable capacity for the enjoyment of life left to a woman of 25.

The pair of lovers had been very happy all the afternoon. Graham Welwyn had been to luncheon with Mrs. and Miss Shirley. They lived in a charming detached villa at Sydenham, and they had also a very nice little flat in Victoria street, which they occupied during the season and made use of for frequent runs up to town when it was not on. It was now early in autumn, and the place at Sydenham was delightful. Mrs. Shirley had kindly and thoughtfully let the lovers alone for a good long time. Stepmothers are not always cruel. Graham had lingered for nearly two hours. The lovers had been talking everything over—and everything looked so rosy! She was delighted with the change to the entirely new country and surroundings, and in her romantic way was sometimes a little sorry that she did not even get seasick, so that she might be sacrificing something for him. Life now to her seemed all one long summer holiday, with youth forever at the prow and love, according to the American phrase, bossing the whole show.

"Look here, darling," Graham said as he got up and took his hat, "I must catch the next train for down, but there's something I want to ask your advice about—a woman would know. I've got a letter—a woman."

"No; really, have you Tom? Then they can write, these women! I was under the impression that somebody said we couldn't do it." "Come, now, don't be ridiculous. This is really a matter I do want your serious consideration about. The letter, you see was not meant for me."

"No? Then whom was it meant for?" "That is just what I don't know. It was addressed name and address all right. But it certainly was not meant for me."

"How do you know, Graham, dear?" "Oh, well, it couldn't, don't you see? It was from a married woman, and it was—well, in fact—a kind of a sort of a—love letter." "But how on earth did she send it to you?" "Well—I know her enough to get invitations to dinner and that—and it may have occurred to me also may have been writing several letters and put one into the wrong envelope."

"Oh, but what nonsense! Nobody ever does that except in stupid novels and plays." "Yes, indeed, I once did it myself. I sent a letter meant for the postmaster general to the manager of a London theater and the letter meant for the manager to the postmaster general." "You silly boy! But you would hardly I should think, make such a muddle where you had any deep interest in the matter. You wouldn't inclose a letter for me in an envelope addressed to the postmaster general?" "Well, no—I don't think I should be likely to do that under any conditions of confusion."
