his own workmen against capitalistic profiteering and oppression.

The idea to carry out his principles on a grand scale had many attractions for King. The moment was favourable, but it was a dangerous moment in King's life when he entered the enormous Rockefeller organization. Many a man of the people had been drawn from his social ideas through close contact with the almighty power of money.

Strikes which were beginning to be a national danger, King brought to an end or prevented by introducing the industrial constitution he had been aiming at for many years. The man who was then leading in the labour news told me that King "always was fair". He received public thanks from many of the largest industrial corporations, for having contributed immeasurable help to war industry. But this is less important than the fact that in Colorado, eighty-five percent of the miners accepted his agreement and the new constitution he had planned. Herein he had succeeded in getting for them the right of complaint, and a formal representation for which they had vainly pleaded. Similar results were obtained in other industries. This meant a beginning of a new trend in labour laws, a trend to the better.

In doing this work of strike mediation, King has a definite merit for helping the American industries in their
