was not most atrixing.—Still I took to the new mode of life very kindly, and by the since I was able to express my wants and wishes in fearfully broken German, I was perfectly happy, for life to so pleasant at wastly I Perhaps, though, I enjoyed my regations even more than I did my terms, for I was my own master, and could wander withher I Perhaps, though, I epjoyed my assations even more than I did my terms, for I was my ewn master, and could wander whither I pleased. I had a passport in my pectet, and a respec'able amount of farins, and with, my kaspack on back I trudged through the whole of the Black Forest, learning German (off a sort, it is true) rapidly on the road, and meeting with various queer adventures. One of the queerest, however, that befel me was in the Voages, and I may as well nareate it here, as another instance of those strange things which travellers sometimes see. I had ever a predilection for Alsace, for in that sappy land the quant bottle holds not ansety a quest, which is a rarity, but just three pluts, which is a marvel. Nor is the quanty of the wine depreciated by the quantity of the wine depreciated by the quantity of the wine depreciated by the quantity of the white wines that grow on the sumy objets of the Voages, If you doubt what I say, take a bumper and try: which you can easily do, reader, on your next visit to Strasborg, by calling in at the Rebatcek, and asking for a litre of white wine with the ochre seal. However, as I knew that I was going into the country where the desirable anticinations, and carefully studying the parallel anticinations, and carefully studying the parallel parallel and to ally at Strasbourg, but strode manifemations, and carefully studying the parallel anticinations, and carefully attailying the parallel anticinations, and carefully attailying the parallel anticination, and carefully attailying the parallel and carefully attailying the para fully away toward the Voges, full of glorious anticipations, and carefully studying the patois by conversing with every pessant I fell in

Miscellaneous.

A Pleasant Night of it!

Ways a very happy period of my He that Roman law at the feet of the great Professor Mitternater at Heidelberg. Luttle did my fond parents reck the way in which I spent my nights, or the med scenes of which I was shaper among the feather-brained Burschen. I had only recently quitted Cambridge after four years of college experience and forget-falness of what I had learned at school; and the contrast a German university presented was not most striking.—Still I took to the new mode of life were hadden on the standard of the terrained of the striking.

by conversing with every peasant I fall in with. There is a very simple plan, however, to make yourselves comprehended in Alsace: always use a French word and a German word alternately; it is wonderful what success you meet with. An infall-ble rule to make yourself liked is by lugging in the name of Napoleon le Grand on every possible occasion, and if you are sufficiently cosmopolitan, you may tacity assent to the fact that he won the battle of Waterloo. of Waterloo.

There is only one defeat connected with Alsace; when it rains there is no mistake about it. I was fated to discover this interceting meteorological fact at the expense of a thorough wetting. I had dined at a little village inn on the inevitable cold yeal and picked plums and when I ast out on my inner. picked plums, and when I set out on my junt pieced plums, and when I set out on my junt to my night's quarters, seventeen miles off, the clouds were beginning to collect ominously in the West. I buttoned my blouse round me and trudged manfully onward along a road which had not been traversed by a respectable conveyance within the memory of man, It was full of ruts hard enough at first, but which a the previously selection of the property of the previously hard services and the previously had been served by was full of rute hard enough at first, but which the persistent rain, which had commenced by this time to fall, couverted into so many pitfalls, into which I was continually slipping. To add to my troubles, night set in with that repidity peculiar to Southern Germany, and there was no sign of the village at which I intended to amend the night. Not a creature intended to spend the night. Not a creature did I meet: nobody was foolish enough to venture out in such weather, save pleasure travellers like myself, and on I went, making about half a mile an hour, and growing very strage: whether the result of the westing, or of indigestion, I really cannot say. My brandy flack had long been empired: there was no chance of filling it, and I was wearied—so wearied that I could have lain down to sleep in a dry ditch, had there been one handy but against that the elements had carefully guarded. There was no hope for it; I must trudge onward.

Suddenly, through the rain, I fancied I could see a light glimmering a short distance from the road. I stopped, and looked stendi-ly; it was no Will-o'-the wisp, and by a sud-den impulse I bounded over the low hedge, and went stumbling over a ploughed field to-wards the house, as I now felt certain it was. Up to the present, I had regarded the peasants's cabins with considerable aversion, and pour cause: they were the dirtiest places imaginable, and I had no desire to sleep in them so long as an auberge could be found, But now I would have gladly pay a handsome sum for the use of a dog-kennel, so long as itsheltered me from the pitiless rain, and held out the prospect of a glass of brandy to warm my in-ner man, which stood so much in need of that I soon approached the cablu which stood beneath the shade of some gloomy trees, and the light, which probably came from the fire, burned so dimly, that I bestated for a moment; approaching it. I am not constitutionally fearful; on the contrary, I am usually too prone to run into foolhardiness; but now, whether it was the scaling or the yeal, I felt whether it was the soaming or too veal, I reit horribly nervous. A moment however, suffic-ed to recover me, and I walked across the yark and knocked boldly at the door. All remained perfectly quiet in the house, except that I fancied I could hear the growling of a huge dog, like distant thunder; then I knocked again same time, however, I had the satise faction of hearing footstaps approach the
