

A Child of Sorrow.

CHAPTER XXVII.

He actually shuddered at the thought of losing her. "No, no," he said. "You shall not go—you must not. It would send me mad if I were to drive you away. You must stay until you are quite well. I won't speak to you about this again. Oh, you needn't be afraid. I shall keep my word; especially—he laughed bitterly—"as I know that if I didn't, you'd take flight. I'll go away myself. No one shall know—not my mother or anyone—that I have spoken to you."

He watched her with a stealthy regard, his natural cunning predominating for the present, at any rate, over his passion. "Give me your word that you won't go, that you won't tell my mother, anyone, and I'll promise not to—worry you again. I'll go away"—he lowered his lids—"as soon as I can. Come, you don't want to make trouble, you don't want to have a fuss, to make my mother unhappy. Give me your word."

"We ought to go," said Maida; "but we will remain for a little while, but it can be only for a little while. I have no right to cause unhappiness to those who have been so good to me."

He drew a long breath. "Good!" he said. "I have got your word—Here's your sister coming; she must not know; we can keep it to ourselves. Walk away towards the horses; you're pale and—she'll see there is something the matter."

He waited until she had gone a few yards, then, swearing between his set teeth, he went to meet the unsuspecting Carrie. As they rode homewards, Robert Broseley tried to appear as if nothing had happened. He kept close to Carrie's side and talked and laughed with her with a forced gaiety, only occasionally speaking across the middle horse to Maida. She was almost silent, except when she was addressed; for she was thinking deeply and sadly; she felt that she was wrong in having permitted him to extract a promise of secrecy from her. She wanted to tell Carrie; it would be difficult to leave Maida world, he was "a nasty one to rile," and, as Carrie had said once or twice, was, in his way, quite as mulish as Maida. Before he had been on the station a week, he had quelled what threatened to be a mutiny by the simple and charming arbitrament of single combat. He had ridden down one morning to the lumber wharf and found the hands busily employed in playing with a greasy pack of cards or sleeping peacefully under the shade of the trees which they ought to have been felling. He had ordered them to work, and when they had refused to do so until they had finished their game, he had got off his horse, taken the pack of cards from the hands of the dealer, and had then quietly invited the biggest of the gang to step aside and take off his coat.

The man—he was called Black Jack by his fellows, and was the most troublesome of the lot—had responded promptly enough. There followed a stiff fight, in which Heroncourt had been rather badly knocked about, but a dexterous back-hander straight from the shoulder had "downed" Black Jack; and, no one coming forward to accept Heroncourt's cheerful invitation, the men decided that the new "boss" was a man to be respected, and obeyed him.

Heroncourt said a few words to them to this effect: "My men, let us understand one another. I have come over here, for my sins, to run this station; in other words, Providence has willed that I should be your master, and I intend to be; but I've no desire to be a hard master. You do the work you've undertaken to do, and I will undertake that you shall be well fed, and that the paymaster shall be on the spot regularly. If any man has any complaint to make, let him come to me, and, if it is a just one, I'll see that he's righted. How does that strike you as fair?"

There was a cheer and cry of "That's all right," from the well-disposed, and a murmur of grudging assent from the bad 'uns, and Heroncourt rode away, victor on that occasion, at any rate.

The little set-to had done him good; the hard work continued to benefit him. In London and down at the Court he had had plenty of time to brood; but here, on the Quasi, he had no leisure for brooding during the day, and at night he was too tired to lie awake. But the memory of Maida was lying curled up in every heart like a little snake, and every now and then it stung him: it was stinging him now as he rode towards the station, and even while he was planning in his mind the work for the next day. Sometimes he wished that he had left word of his whereabouts with Maida; but he knew that she would not have written to him, that there was only one hope for him—that he should make a fortune out here in this far-away place, and so be able to return and claim her.

The sun was at its height when he came in sight of the station, but he had grown accustomed to the heat, for he was as tough and sinewy as a greyhound. Presently there arose the barking of dogs, and half a dozen of them came bounding out to meet him as he rode into the enclosure. The building was small and rough, was indeed little better than a log hut with a large kind of lean-to shed at the back for the housing of the men when they were at home; but it had a comfortable look and quite satisfied Heroncourt to whom it already seemed like home. Much as he sympathized with the value case and luxury, it is wonderful how little we miss them when we are compelled to do without them. No man was more fastidious about his surroundings, in clothes and his little personal luxuries, than Heroncourt when he was in England; but out here he roughed it without any sense of loss. He slept on a straw pallet and sometimes out in the open under a blanket; his food was of the plainest—not seldom a crust of bread served for his lunch, another slice accompanied by a piece of meat and a can of tea, did duty for his dinner—he had a couple of riding suits—and he had left his silver-backed hair brushes behind him with his London clothes. But he missed nothing of all these; indeed, but for that perpetual aching in his heart he would have found happiness enough in this invigorating life in the open air, in the manifold interests of the work he had undertaken. As he was dismounted, a couple of hands sprang forward to take his horse, and a girl with a pleasant face and child-like blue eyes came to the door of the hut and, shading her eyes with her hand, looked out from under it with a smile of welcome; but the stiff figure of Baxter slipped by her, as if it were his place, and no one else's to welcome the master.

No pen can tell how great a comfort Baxter had been to Heroncourt. His presence had lessened the sense of loneliness, had given the sense of companionship which all men feel and crave for in a strange land. He had tried to persuade Baxter to return to England, had pointed out to him that he—Heroncourt—could have no possible use for a valet; but Baxter had obstinately refused to leave his master.

"I am hoping you can find I can do something else besides valet you, my lord," he had said, and he proved his hope a correct one.

An old soldier can generally turn his hand to anything, and Baxter, as General Utility, soon proved his usefulness.

He helped with the cooking, he could act as a spare rider, he could wait at table—if the rough-and-ready service could be called waiting—he was an excellent shot and he still valetted Heroncourt to the extent permitted by his master; at any rate, Heroncourt's linen was always in order and his riding-suits well brushed. Baxter had found it difficult to exchange the "my lord" for "sir," but he had succeeded at last and no one suspected that the new boss, Mr. Owen Tudor, was an English peer.

"Luncheon's ready, sir," said the girl, from over Baxter's shoulder.

"The master will want to change first," said Baxter, with a kind of growl. "I've taken the water to your room, sir. You forget he's been riding ever since daybreak!" he added, in an undertone of reproach to Lucy. "Oh, no, I don't," she said, with a jerk of her pretty chin. "And I suppose I can keep the things back, can't I, Mr. Baxter?"

Everyday Etiquette.

"I am going to entertain twelve ladies at four o'clock. Should I call it a luncheon or a reception?" questioned Mrs. Newleywed. "You can hardly call it a luncheon as it is too late in the afternoon. It might be called an afternoon tea. A reception is a large and more formal affair with only punches and wafers and some light refreshments like that," replied kind Mrs. Neighbour.
