

ANNABEL OR THE TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE TERRIBLE REVELATION. Oh, heaven, the agony, the despair of Annabel when the discovery was made!

"Ah, you've got it now, I see," he chucklingly observed. "You know at last who I am. My face has been puzzling you all along, but you never could make it out."

"I do indeed," gasped Annabel, with an irrepressible shudder. "Say what?" "Oh, I cannot—I cannot."

"Don't keep it back on account of my feelings. I want you to say it. Now then—I'm—who?" Annabel sank trembling back upon her chair, no longer able to support herself upright.

"You'll say it?" continued Dick. "No, no," she groaned. "Then I'll say it for you. You recognize me as the robber of Woolman's Lane—the man as was about to relieve your uncle of his stick, steetors, when you and your sweetheart came up and prevented me. You didn't know he was your uncle then, and the business seemed to turn out spiky for both of you. Ha, ha! you were counting without cost. You didn't reflect that I had to be reckoned with for the spoiling of my game and the smashing of my arm. Oh, so, I was a devil of a wretch, fit only to be crushed and mauled, without the power to retaliate. Well, you and your brave sweetheart will find out your mistake. For that blow I'll wring both your hearts till the last drop of agony they can bear is squeezed out of them."

"Oh, Dick, you will not harm me?" cried Annabel, in the extremity of her terror. "For your own sake you will not. Mrs. Langton knows you have come with me on the journey, and she and Mr. Langton will—"

"Ho, ho. You count on that, do you?" interrupted Dick, with triumphant rapidity. "What will you say when I tell you that Mrs. Langton knows all about it, and has hired me to bring you and keep you here?"

"I will say that it is not true," said Annabel, with forced calmness. "You couldn't believe such a thing of her—she's too good to do anything so wicked, is she?"

"I do not need, Dick, to judge of her capability," answered Annabel, who was, however, by the words, disagreeable reminded of a certain unfavorable impression she had formed of Mrs. Langton's character. "Suppose it possible that she could have done as you say, she had no motive for it; and, even if she had, Mr. Langton is infinitely above such a thing. No, no, Dick, you try in vain to frighten me by such preposterous suggestions."

"Ah, you see things uncommon well, I must say. Yet you are a bit blind, too. Mrs. Langton has no motive for it, has she not? Just think a bit and you will find she has. Who but you keeps her out of the estate?"

Annabel started violently. "Aha! that enlightens you. You didn't think of that before." "Never," murmured Annabel. "But Mrs. Langton would not yield to such a temptation."

"Wouldn't she? You wish to believe it, I dare say, but secretly you have doubts. Ain't I right now?" "No, I cannot—will not—think it possible," cried Annabel, with an earnestness which she hoped was not in any degree forced.
