WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY

Messages Now Exchanged Over Distance of 3,000 Miles.

Commenting upon an article on his experiments with wireless telegraphy by Professor Reginald A. Fessenden, in the London Electrical Review, the COTTAGE AND FOUR ACRES; ONE New York journal of the same name says: "But little has been heard during the last year or two of the real progress that has been made in the art: therefore the article by Professo: Fessenden, which deals with the work he has done, is very acceptable. Professor Fessenden has been conducting experiments in various parts of the world, notably across the Atlantic Ocean between stations at Boston, Mass., and Machrihanish, Scotland. The distance between the latter two stations is some 3,000 miles, yet it seems that, under favorable conditions, messages can be exchanged easily and reliably. The work, however, has not consisted merely in the exchange of signals, but has been an attempt to study scientifically the conditions affecting transmission, with a view to improvement and increased reliability. The latter phase is exceedingly important, because the ability to send messages varies very greatly on different days and during different part of the same day. "Professor Fessenden has found that sent out under similar conditions on other days. This is an important fact, for it means that in order to be able to send messages without fail on any day a factor of safety, so to speak of 500, or possibly more, will be necessary. This may be secured either by an increase in sensitiveness of the receiving apparatus or an increase in the power of the impulses sent out. Probably, in practice, both means will be adopted; but it does not seem likely that it will be sufficient to adopt a certain intensity of transmission known to be ample for the worst conditions and use this on all occasions, for when the conditions are favorable to transmission such intense signals would not only be unnecessary, but probably detrimental. They might not only affect the operation of stations other TO LET-STORE, 247 DUNDAS STREET, now occupied by Patten.—Cameron Brown, 27 Craig. 'Phone 884. Under conditions such that these echo signals were fairnear Richmond; store 60x20 and portion of another; all on ground floor; also upper floor, same building; excellent shipping facilities; also in the Albion Building, double room, with vault, and cessary to test the transmision conly intense, they probably would be rather troublesome at the receiving single room; all steam heated. Apply ditions frequently, and use an intensity T. H. Carling, at the brewery. Ditf reception. These changes in conditions affecting transmission may take place with some rapidity. Those due to the action of sunlight are known to be rapid. Therefore it will be necessary to make these tests at rather frequent intervals. "Besides the action of sunlight, which was pointed out some time ago. Professor Fessenden has found that there appear to be large masses of absorbing material in the atmosphere which considerably reduce the intensity On Farm and City Property, at 5 p.c. of the signals. These absorbing masses may be larger or smaller, and may exist at various heights. In the tropics Barrister, Solicitor, &c., 871/2 Dundas St. they seem to be lower down, so that transmission there over long distances is more difficult than in the temperate zones. In fact, it is found that in some cases the absorption may be so great as to leave only about one-tenth per cent. of the energy to effect the signals. If, as assumed, these absorbing masses are somewhat of the nature of clouds, they must be shifting about, and thus will cause changes in transmission conditions. Another peculiar effect found is what has been called aeolo tropic absorption. Messages at certain times have been found to be transmitted more easily in east and west directions than in north and south. At other times the transmission north and south is better. There are also indications that defraction takes place. These effects might be due to the shifting about of the absorbing masses referred to above." The Cadmium Standard Cell. Dr. George A. Hulett recently spoke
