THE GURNEY HOT WATER RADIATOR

Points of Advantage.

THE accompanying illustrations represent a new Radiator for Hot Water Heating, novel in method of operation, construction, and design; and we respectfully ask for a candid and critical judgment of the following claims:

THE WATER is introduced at the top of the Radiator, the purpose sought being to secure positive circulation by allowing the atoms of water to sink as their density is increased by parting with heat, without being disturbed by ascending particles of heated water.

THE VALVE, which is an integral part of each Radiator, is simple in operation and not nearly as liable to get out of order as that usually supplied. It has an open way, and may be operated without stooping and by a single movement of the wrist.

THE DESIGN is capable of the largest variety of treatment by the decorator. It may be simply bronzed in one or two colors, or it may be treated to correspond with either floor or wall ornament. The top has been worked into the general design, and while affording ample base for ornament, is not so objectionable to the critical eye as the heavy cornice top which has so long offended correct taste.
