

that the policy enunciated by them in the recent election was a good one, or, at all events, that it should have a fair trial—yet, at the same time, he was above all a member of Parliament, and, as such, inclined to oppose at the very outset any attempt on the part of the Government to interfere, or exercise in any degree the powers or authority which they derived from their positions as Commissioners or representatives of the Crown in the management of the internal affairs of this House. Let them, at least, have one place in this country where they should be free to express their opinions and exercise their delegated authority. He took this opportunity to refer to a personal matter. They knew that a number of newspapers had connected his name with the Speakership, and for that reason his attention had been drawn to the position of that officer. But he would say that, neither from the Government, nor any member of the Government, had he received any advances in reference to the Speakership, nor had he sought the position. He confessed that, when he saw a disposition, no matter where, to encroach upon the privileges of Parliament, he was not disposed to assent or acquiesce. It was the duty of every member to resist any improper assumption of authority in this body. It was a question that ought to be discussed with reference to the Statutes and their rules, which, if defective, should be amended. He trusted that would be the result of this discussion. He did not think that the hon. gentleman came up to Ottawa on the eve of the meeting of Parliament to appoint gentlemen to certain positions in this House, against the public interest. He exercised an authority which legally belonged to him, though it might have been an indiscreet exercise of authority. However, all these matters would probably be before them when the papers were sent down, and when probably they would be referred to the Committee of Privileges and Elections for consideration.
