The Breaking Point

In the grip of a situation that was too much for him Basset rang the bell. It was answered by the elderly maid who took care of his own bedroom.

Months later, puzzling over the situation, Basset was to wonder, and not to know, whether chance or design brought the Thorwald woman to the door that night. At the time, and for weeks, he laid it to tragic chance, the same chance which had placed in Dick's hand the warning letter that had brought him West. But as time went on the part played in the tragedy by that faded woman, with her tired, dispirited voice and her ash-colored hair streaked with gray, assumed other proportions, loomed large and mysterious.

There were times when the wished that some presence of danger that made him throttle her then and there so she could not have raised her shrill, alarming voice. But he had no warning. All he saw was a woman in a washed-out blue calico dress and a fresh white apron, raising incriminating eyes to his.

"I suppose it's all right if she sits in the hall?" Basset inquired, still the foot of the stairs and demanded fighting his losing fight. "She can go in if she sits."

"Right-o," said the doctor, who had been to France and who brought home some British phrases.

Basset walked muck from the hospital alone. The game was up and he knew it. Sooner or later — in a way he tried to defend himself to himself. He had done his best. Two or three days ago he would have been exultant over the developments. After all, mince things as one could, Clark was a murderer. Other men killed and paid the penalty. And the game was not up entirely, at that. The Providence which had watched over him for so long might continue to. The hospital was new. (It was ironically enough, the Clark Memorial Hospital.) There was still a chance.

He was conscious of something strange as he entered the lobby. The constable was gone, and there was no clerk behind the desk. At the foot of the stairs stood a group of guests and loungers, looking up, while a bell-boy barred the way.

Even then Basset's first thought was of fire. He elbowed his way to

OLDSMOBILE

In the General Motors Research Corporation, hundreds of research specialists are continually striving to find ways of making motor cars better. As quickly as a new process or design is perfected, Oldsmobile engineers have the advantage of it. This accounts for the high standard of quality maintained by Oldsmobile.

to be allowed to go up, but he was refused.

"In a few minutes," said the boy.

"No need of excitement."

"Is it a fire?"

"I don't know myself. I've got my orders. That's all."

Wilkins came hurrying in. The crowd, silent and respectful before the law, opened to let him through and closed behind him.

Basset stood at the foot of the stairs looking up.

To Elizabeth the first days of Dick's absence were unbelievable dreary. She seemed to live only from one visit of the postman to the next. She felt some times that only a part of her was at home in the Wheeler house, slept at night in her white bed, donned his black frocks and took them off, and made those sad daily pilgrimages to the cemetery above the town, where her mother, tilted with tender hands the long, narrow mound, so fearfully reminding of Jim's tall, slim body.

And because of this division in herself, because she felt that her loyalty to her father and her mother and would follow her love through the rest of her life, she was touchingly anxious to comfort and to please them.

"She's taking Dick's absence very hard," Mrs. Wheeler said one night when she had kissed them and gone up-and little caressing touches on bowed heads and grief-stopped shoulders. It put away Jim's clothing, and kept immaculate the room where now her mother spent most of her waking hours. It sent her on her knees at night, to pray for Jim's happiness in some young-man heaven which would please him. But the other part of her was not there at all. It was off with Dick in some mysterious place of mountains and vast distance, called Wyoming.

And because of this division in herself, because she felt that her loyalty to her father and her mother and would follow her love through the rest of her life, she was touchingly anxious to comfort and to please them.

sometimes; that Jim had been saved a great deal. That to live on, and to lose the things one loved, one by one, was harder than to go quickly, from a joyous youth.

He had not told her what he knew about Jim's companion that night. She would never have understood. In her simple and child-like faith she knew that her boy sat that day among the blessed company of heaven. He himself believed that Jim had gone forgiven into whatever lay behind the veil we call death, had gone shriven and clean before the Judge who knew the urge of youth and life. He did not fear for Jim. He only missed him.

He walked around the block that night, a stooped, commonplace figure, the dog at his heels. Now and then he spoke to him, for companionship. At the corner he stopped and looked along the side street toward the Livingston house, and as he looked he sighed. Jim and Nina, and now Elizabeth. Jim and Nina were beyond his care now. He could do no more. But what could he do for Elizabeth? That, too, wasn't that beyond him? He stood still, facing the tragedy of his helplessness, beset by vague apprehensions. He went on doggedly, his hands clasped behind him, his head sunk on his breast.

He lay awake for a long time that night, wondering whether he and Dick had been quite fair to Elizabeth. She should, he thought, have been told. Then, if Dick's apprehensions were justified, she would have had some preparation. As it was—suppose something turned up out there, something that would break her heart?

Reduces the cost of upkeep

WHEN your car hits the inevitable rough bumps, Hasslers' absorb the shocks of both upthrow and rebound in the necessarily high resilient action of good springs; they save you not only discomfort in riding, but the pain of paying for needlessly injured springs.

No need to tell you that the bumps, jars, jolts and vibration suffered by any good car on city streets are only too real. Busy repair shops prove it. Motor nerves prove it. You need Hasslers'.

When you want to renew your car, you will enjoy enhanced re-sale value, made possible by Hasslers' saving your car!

Saved gasoline alone would pay for Hasslers, not to mention saved repairs, tires and re-sale value. You pay for Hasslers' anyway, why not have Hasslers' now! Your dealer knows these Hassler facts.

Exide BATTERIES

No law compels you to use a weak battery

It is not only unnecessary to have a weak battery in your car, it is unsafe, uncomfortable and poor economy.

An Exide starts your engine whenever you step on the pedal and gives you lights when you want them. It will do these things as a matter of course and for so long a time that an Exide is the most economical battery you can buy.

Don't put up with an ordinary battery when you can easily get an Exide. More cars leave the factories equipped with Exides than any other battery. Have a look at the battery when you are selecting a new car.
