The war was ended-the long, dreadful Franco-Prussian war-but what ared it all to poor little Felica watching by her sick father's bedside, and knowing that while all the others rejoiced she must mourn, since the cruel wound in his breast, caused a Prussian bullet, could not be aled, and under it he was sinking day by day, even while the Prussian outs of victory still rent the air.

A few more hours or days at farthest and she would be an orphan, left alone to battle with the world—alone well the way up those many stairs, and ed, that it no longer seemed Paris. Ah ! could her pretty grisette mother have forseen this day, she would have named her child Infelice not Felice, which signified "happiness."

"Felice !" It was scarcely more than that your future troubles me. I had a of idling them with a young and handlittle sum laid up for your dower. It some man who belonged to another nimself from his pillow, the exertion bringing a scarlet flush on the wasted

For a time she fancied they had with it shut out all the sunshine from her life, and will take you home to my own country when, spite of the fact that day by day when, spite of the fact that day by day her scanty hoard diminished, as the weeks were on, sometimes a snatch of song would come rippling upward to "No, dear. I am an American." her young lips, or a burst of laughter sound through the strangely silent rooms, she would check it as though it were a sin. Ah, she need not have feared! The sleeper slept on, heed feared! The sleeper sleep on, heed feared! The sleeper s brooding of her grief—the stern tomorrow which must be met ere it

There were many kind to her, but poor-made more so by the cruel destation of the war—and none of them could afford to do more than pity, and from time to time, perhaps, invite her to their scanty board. In the great city all was turmoil and confusion.-Search for employment seemed useless, and so it was that one evening at dusk the child, absolutely faint through story. hunger, and weary physically and mentally from her long day's search for work, suddenly saw the lights grow dark before her, and stumbling, fell. -Two strong arms lifted her up ; a kind, pitying face looked into hers; and when she at last opened her tired eyes with a long, fluttering sigh, a tender voice said den light dawning upon him)—"your very low, speaking in her mother

The next moment she felt the found herself seated in a cab with her protector, and too exhausted to question or dispute. No word was spoken the door of the house where she lodged; left her only to return with wine and

"It is so difficult to get food now in Paris," he said, with quick delicacy; and you, a girl, alone—for you I should think it would be almost impossible. I am more fortunate, you see. Come, may we dine together?"

"Ah. Monsieur," she answered, "you are good. It is true I am hungry; but not because there is no food, gry; but not because there is no food, but that, day by day, my little stock of Tonsorial Artist, money is becoming exhausted, and I dare not drain it lest darker days are in store for me." And then, with unconscious grace, she told all her sad very little—just that I might live an honest life."

"It must not be too little," he smilingly replied. "My friends can pay well. I will arrange that. For the present, to secure your services, you SPECIFICATIONS must accept this," pressing in her hand a roll of notes. "Nay," as she would have refused, "it is customary. It is simply a guarantee of our mutual good faith. But I forget—I have not even told you my name. Here is my card. To-morrow I bring you your pupils .-

Until then, my little friend, goodnight.' What wonder that Felice sat, as h had left her, stunned and motionless, listening to his footsteps echoing down the stairs, gasing down at the money and the card her fingers held, or that at last the notes fell fluttering to her feet; but the card bearing Mark Liston's MIRAMICHI
