English papers complain that hydro-phobia has latterly become alarmingly frequent in that country. Here also there has been an unusual number of cases of the decease reported during the past three months. The remedy is simple. If every dog-owner would chain his dog up for one month so that the animal could neither bite other dogs nor be bitten by them, and if every which showed symptoms of madness during the period of confinement were to be killed, hydrophobia would be thoroughly stamped out. Is that not a proper subject for local legislation?
