HAMILTON EVENING TIMES' TUESDAY. JULY 13 1909.

But Sir Ralph was completely non-plused by the bold, strategical move-iment of the world-wise woman that he knew not how to inform Lilian that the must not only endure that hated 1cr-son's presence but also permit nerselt to be posted and made muen of by her ladyship. For, encouraged by the success of her tactics, Lady Melville did not tail to pay Lilian particular attention; she insisted upon reminding her, in a dozen different and trivial ways, of the relationship between them, and mover met the beautiful girl's half-puzzled and confused glance but with the sweat smill of arfection. Dinner was announced, and with the mortheres Glande the present of the But Sir Ralph was completely non Dinner was announced, and with the announcement, entered several of the gentlemen, Claude Ainsley among them. He knew that Lady Melville had erriv-ed, and was therefore prepared to shake hands with the woman who held bis heart, with well-bred ease; on neither side could the uninitiated have detect-ed any signs of emotion, but the thin lips of Lord Harcourt wreathed into a sneer behind his moustache as he sew behind his moustache as he sc the fluttering of the lace upon her lady-ship's bosom, which revealed how great an effort it was to receive the sun-burn-ed traveler with indifferent cordiality.

The layer shall be provided by the subscription of the stress of the st voice, and clear, musical laugh harmon-ized with the low buzz of well-bred con-versation, and the tinkling of silver and glass. She knew the power of charming which she possessed, and exerted her-self to make a good impression upon Sir Ralph and Lilian, drew out Mr. Be-sant on hunting, encouraged his mother to talk of the alderman, enlisted Miss Dalton's sympathies for a pet bazaar, and, catching at the pei hobbies and weak points of each, brought them out to their owner's delight and Sir Ralph's amusement To him, of course, she was all amiability, toned down by a nice, discriminating respect. To Claude Ains-ley she was almost silent, and Lord Har-court-who, while appearing to join in conversation with indolent abandon, really had ears and eyes for every word and look-knew that behind the bright smile and pleasant laugh, a storm of and look—knew that behind the bright smile and pleasant laugh, a storm of jealousy was raging madly. Miss Lucas sat quietly at a remote corner of the table apparently lost to everything save the pattern of the wall paper, but with ears and eyes acute and watchful as his lordship's. The ladies rose and the gentlemen were left to diminish the wines. When they followed into the drawing room, Lady Melville had retired, plead-ing as an excuse that she had travelled a long way and was tired. There was some music and a card

Lilian would not sing, and waited expecting some sign from her father every moment, but non-came and she retired with Miss Lucas, having received nothing more definite than his low-breathed "Good-night, my darling. She might be a very quiet, insignifi-cant little lady, but she was a wise wo-man, who knew how to smooth the sat-in coat of everybody's hobby horse. This morning, with a tact that would have done credit to Lady Meiville her-self the quiet companion discussed the probabilities of the coming hunting senson, and actually inspected the sta-bles under Mr. Besant's escort. From horses the conversation glided to the various families around, and the capabilities of their male members as fox hunters.

"My father only got the hounds after Sir William's death." There was the opening, and Miss Lar-cas seized it. Before they had regained the house she had learned from the talk-ative squire the exact position in which Lady Melville was placed in respect to the Rivershall property, and had worm-ed the information out of him without his being conscious of having been pumped. "There was the shadow of a smile up-on Miss Lucas' pale face as she thought of her morning chat: and while Mr. Besant marched off with the impression that "that governess was a decent, sen-sible sort of a woman." "that gover-ness" was watching and waiting for her pres. The ladjes were going for a ride, and

But as her eyes encountered those to f the polite and attentive Miss Lucas the smile suddenly disappeared and en expression of faint distrust and suspi-cion replaced it.
