

TRAMPED 60 MILES TO SAVE HIS CHUM

Prospector at Larder Lake Got Back with GIN PILLS Just in Time.

LARDER LAKE, ONT., MARCH 26th, 1911. "I am writing to tell you the good GIN PILLS did me. I had been suffering for some time with my kidneys and urine. I was constantly passing water which was very scanty, sometimes as many as thirty times a day. Each time, the pain was something awful and I had to stop at once. I tried to get to the prospector at Larder Lake, but I was so weak that I could not walk. I was so weak that I could not walk. I was so weak that I could not walk."

A MYSTERIOUS QUEST.

CHAPTER XVI.

A STARTLING INTRODUCTION.

Some questions are very hard to answer; this was meant to be one of them. But Miss Aspinwall had the courage of despair and did not shrink from uttering a thrilling response.

"I have not much acquaintance with the plumage which the blind god sports, but if the happiness which I see there is from him, I can only say that he chose a noble couple to bestow it upon. Mr Degraw is a gifted man, and Miss Rogers is a gifted woman. Why should they not appreciate each other?"

On the other side of the room the subjects of these remarks were listening to the music and whispering short sentences into each others' ears. If Cupid were there he heard words which surely had been murmured under his auspices before. For they are always new.

"I love you, signorina, I love you love you! Do you think you can trust me to make you happy? I do not ask you to answer at once, only do not forbid me speaking. You are so beautiful, so beautiful!"

A soft sigh was her only reply. "I know that the only reply is short since we were strangers, and I know nothing of your life or of you. But such a reconnoitre as brought us first together is equal to a year of common companionship, for in it we were both death and life. I loved you when I thought you were dead, and now, that I touch you and hear you speak, I am moved by such overwhelming emotions, that for me there is nothing of interest in the world but love and our two selves."

"Ah!" was again the murmured reply. "Is love so sweet? Does it compensate one for other worldly losses. I would gladly believe so. Teach me."

THE PATIENT BRAIN

A tireless worker so long as supplied with rich, red blood.

The brain is one of the most patient and industrious organs of the body. It can be induced, by good treatment, to perform prodigies of work. But it is sensitive and will not brook abuse. It responds to the lash at first, but if the lash is laid on too hard it balks.

Nervous trouble is generally brain trouble, and no suffering is to be compared to mental suffering, with the accompanying dread, suspicion and melancholy. One-fifth of the blood in the human body is consumed by the brain, so make the blood rich and red by using Dr. Chase's Nerve Food, and you will overcome diseases of the nerves. Headaches will disappear, irritability will go, digestion will improve, and weakness and despondency will give place to new hope and courage, new vigor and energy.

Dr. A. W. Chase's Nerve Food will enable you to avoid such extreme nervous trouble as prostration and paralysis. 50 cents a box, 6 boxes for $2.50, all dealers, or Edmanson, Bates & Co., Toronto.

room, and, with one accord, each head turned toward the artist, who himself bore the name just spoken. He had risen, and though all were ready to behold in his face surprise at this bizarre introduction of one of his own name into this limited circle, they were not prepared for the vivid expression of incomprehensible and growing emotion which his countenance so forcibly betrayed. It was as if he had received a shock in which there was something like fear, but the step he took forward and the gesture which he made showed that the fear was not for himself, but for another; and the question immediately rose in every mind: "Who is this other, and what is there to fear?"

The gentleman whose introduction had aroused all this curiosity was meanwhile standing in a courteous way before Miss Aspinwall, who, after the first instant of hesitation, had greeted him with genuine warmth and one of her frankest smiles.

"You must pardon us," said she, "the seeming discourtesy of your welcome. But there is another Hamilton Degraw in the room, and the name being an unusual one, my first thought was that you were seeking an introduction to him. Will you sit, Mr. Degraw, while I read Mr. Morris' note?"

The stranger smiled and bowed and took the seat offered him. He was in no degree embarrassed, and if conscious of all the glances levelled upon him, did not show it. But perhaps he was not conscious of them. For the moment his attention was released by the preoccupation of his hostess, he turned at once towards the window-seat with an eagerness that made the indignant blood leap into the cheeks of the watchful artist, and though there was no impertinence in his manner, nor any recognition beyond that which is accorded by an appreciative nature to suddenly revealed beauty, all those who had passed sufficiently beyond their first youth to have any insight into life and the human heart, felt that trouble had entered the room with this second Hamilton Degraw, and that in the very moment of his introduction, the first scene in a drama had opened that would ere long occupy all their thoughts.

Nor was this seemingly unfelt even by the object of his interest. Though her agitation was natural enough when we consider that her heart and possibly her lips were trembling with the name he so unceremoniously announced to be his own, there was still something in her attitude and the agitation which informed her whole figure, that expressed the presence of a fear similar to that expressed by the artist. Was it that she felt the burning ardor of this stranger's glance, and realized the complications which a new love at this time would occasion? Or had she become in some way aware that the name she had just heard was not only that of her lover, but the man who had wrought mischief with so many of the name of Jenny Rogers? Whichever be the truth, she showed an emotion almost greater than that of her lover, though it did not last so long. By the time Miss Aspinwall had finished her note, the signorina's face had become calm, and her figure regained its poise, and though a steady pallor had taken the place of her fitful blushes, not a face in the room looked more composed or a mind more at its ease than hers.

"I am much obliged to Mr. Morris," was Miss Aspinwall's remark, as she folded up the note. "I am always glad to receive any one upon his recommendation; and in this case his recommendation is very pressing." And, turning towards her friends, she observed, in her own gracious, dignified way: "Ladies and gentlemen, allow me to introduce to you Mr. Degraw, of Cleveland; a friend of my friend, and soon, I hope, to be a friend of each one of us."

The young people immediately crowded forward, for the stranger, while not handsome, that is, in comparison with the gentlemen usually associated with his name, possessed a figure and bearing likely to attract all lovers of elegance and culture. Two of the company only remained in the rear, and these were the signorina and her lover, who, not relaxing one iota of his defiance, stood at her side as if on guard, while he sought to catch Miss Aspinwall's eye, as if to warn her to be careful in her demonstrations toward a person with whom were connected his gravest doubts.

For in the rapid glances which he had bestowed upon this interloper since his first entrance, he had noted that the stranger was tall, easy-mannered, and possessed not only of the gray eyes which had misled the police in his own case, but of the black mustache also; and, believing that he had before him the man who had occasioned so much mischief in the city he had just left, he neither could suppress, nor did he endeavor to, the spirit of antagonism and rage which, without these reasons for dislike, would have been sufficiently aroused by the persistent delight which the stranger manifested in contemplating the woman whom the artist now regarded as his future wife.
