

WE'LL NOT GIVE UP OLD ENGLAND.

From old Atlantic's rock-ribbed shores
To Pacific's golden sands,
Lies a land that is bound to the British Throne,
By stronger than iron bands;
'Tis a daughter's love for a mother-land—
A pride in her deeds of wonder;
And the power is yet to be made on the earth
That can tear the twain asunder.
The years may come, and the years may go,
The hills grow white with winter's snow,
The vales grow green and the rivers flow,
But England will never desert her,—No!
And she'll never desert Old England.

Her lakes would be "oceans" in other lands,
Her valleys gardens fair;
And the sons that dwell on her healthful hills
Would be heroes anywhere.
They love the land that is over the sea,
With a warm and pure devotion,
And they love their own as the brightest gem
In the crown of that "Gem of the Ocean."
The years may come and the years may go,
The hills grow white with winter's snow,
The vales grow green and the rivers flow,
But England will never desert them,—No!
And they'll never desert Old England.

Just over the border long Jonathan lives—
A thievish, conceited elf,
Who thinks the theft of a country no crime,
And the "world" means simply himself.
Sometimes he woos her with many a smile,
But she of his wooing is coy;
And sometimes he talks of his right and his might
Like a blustering, braggart boy.
But the years may come and the years may go,
The hills grow white with winter's snow,
The vales grow green and the rivers flow,
But he never shall have the Dominion,—No!
He never shall have the Dominion.

She asks no favors that he can bestow,
Except to be left alone;
And she fears no frown or threats he can make,
While she clings to the British Throne.
She wants no visits from him or his friends—
Either Fenian or fisherman thieves—
And she wants no garland to deck her brow
But a wreath of Maple Leaves.
For the years may come and the years may go,
And the hills grow white with winter's snow,
The vales grow green, and the rivers flow,
But England will never desert her,—No!
And she'll never desert Old England.
