fire, and the Americans returned to the attack. With the Reina Christina destroyed and many of his other ships shattered. Admiral Montejo was hard put to it for a defense. He forced the Americans to maneuver, however, and got them in positions of great danger from the fire of the forts. In the second attack the Baltimore, Olympia, Concord and Boston made for the crippled Spanish ships, firing their heavy guns with great rapidity. The Spanish gunners stood nobly to their guns and answered shot for shot. The wooden cruiser Castilla was then set on fire. The Americans continued to pour their fire upon the vessel and to prevent the magazine from exploding she was scuttled, and the crew made for the shore in their boats or British lives and interest would be upon pieces of the shattered spars.

BLOWN UP. The Don Juan de Austria was even ess fortunate. She, too, was crippled by the shots of the Americans, and in her helpless condition could not escape the storm of shot and shell, and suddenly her magazine exploded. A great cloud of smoke, from which flames seemed to leap, was seen to rise above the faithful ship, and she was seen no more. The little gunboat Mindanao and the cruiser Don Antonio de Ulloa were in the thick of the combat, and sustained a heavy fire for an hour.

All this time the guns in the forts were firing at the American warships. Great damage must have been done the attacking fleet, though the effectiveness of the fire was somewhat interfered with by the fear of damaging the foreign merchant ships in the bay. The governor-general had given orders that under no circumstances was any injury to be inflicted on the foreign shipping, so when the American squadron moved into the vicinity of the merchantmen the guns of the forts were forced to silence. LONDON TIMES' ACCOUNT.
