She got up and took the nearest photograph from the ledge and she stood with it pressed, not to her lips, but to her heart; and as she stood there, with her eyes closed, there came to her that same feeling which she had expressed to her sister when she had told Beth of her betrothal, the feeling that what she had was too much, that she had more than her share; and with this feeling there mingled also a yearning to express her gratitude in some noble way, to lift herself out of the frothy happiness of her childhood and shape herself anew, finding fresh significance even in the commonplace things of life and duty everywhere!

would save such a lot of bother. But I suppose people would be horrified."

"I don't know that we need trouble about other people," said Carlingford.

"However, don't say anything to Flora today. Of course, she would like a very grand affair, but I fancy we shall get our way with Beth."

"Beth has always done what I wanted," said Drusilla. "Please be awfully nice to her today; she is growing so fond of you—you have a way of making people fond of you."

said Drusilla.

He laughed, and then he said half seriously: "tell me how much you love me."
