Editor's Talk

C UMMER reading is now the order of the season. We believe that most people read more pictures in summertime than anything else. There may be problems, but the time to solve them is when people are wearing heavy clothes and paying coal bills. At this time of year everybody takes as long a vacation as possible except the editor. In order that other people's reading may be as easy as possible at a time when too much intellectual exertion is part of the pace that kills, he must work all the harder to solve the problem of delightful and profitable inertia on the part of his readers.

For the next two months the editor will not be surprised if nobody writes a letter to the paper either approving or condemning anything in it. He has no objection to the rest of the world taking it easy, so long as they leave him time and space for the labour that lightens other people's burdens. There is a time to solve problems and a time to let problems take care of themselves. There is a place for the inkpot and another for the camp frying-pan. The man with the frying-pan is probably the better philosopher.
