

what was thrown away (at birth) was the source from which I sprang," he said to his elder brother.

And though Nānā'pātām was not pleased with the thought that so soon he was to part from his younger brother, yet it was useless for him to beg (Nānabushu) to let him go along.

But Nānabushu knew his feelings, and so said to him: "O my elder brother! during this day will I go with you, for I wish to walk round this island, so that larger it may become," he said to him, "and at the same time that you may know how big is the region over which you are to keep watch."

And so they truly started off, they went walking along the shore by the edge of the water. Now, as they thus walked along, of a sudden mindful was the man; as he looked behind, land only did he see. Now, as they went they talked, but nothing to say had he who was the elder brother. "Let us quicken our pace!" he was told by his younger brother, Nānabushu. "Soon will the evening come on, and we shall not have returned to where we live," he said to his elder brother. And then, as they went along, he explained to his elder brother how he should rule over them who were there.

And so at last he was asked by his elder brother: "O my younger brother!" he was asked, "what is the reason that you are not chief over them, you who brought back to life them that now are alive?" he said to him.

Accordingly Nānabushu gave answer to his elder brother: "O my elder brother!" he said to him, "it is you whom I wish to watch over them," he said to him.

"Oh!" he was told.

And now they were arriving at the place from whence they had started; as they were now drawing nigh to the place, then he who was the elder brother beheld a mighty