service, scattered themselves over the neighboring rouds and paths.

A cold shudder came over him. He could almost have believed in witcheraft, for he was under the false impression that it was not yet nine o'clock. Granted that on the sput of the moment he had set out, it would have been a full hour and a builf before he could reach the distant caulte of Mr. Pyk. Then it would be half-past elsem.

Probably the company invited to the betrothal had assembled itself already—probably he was alvesdy the object of the common conversation—probably Bessie and her aunt were already there. To scape the heat of the sum, they had probably taken advantage of the little "Valley Oundbis" to go nine miles in the cool of the morning. And the bridegroom stood yet before the glass, ancombed and unpowered, with white hair-papers on his head.

It is a characteristic of great men, that under the most adverse circumstances, they are not disconcerted. All that is grand and moving is appropriate to their being and doing. On the contrary, it it is the property of the contrary, it is the contrary of the contrary, it is now all that can be and to save the honor or of Mr. Quint. The greatest serrifices, the greatest pains that man can endure, he would have borne with heroic courage; but at this moment before the glass, while the willage clock struck, his strength left him.

For the third time, he strew of his clothes, and put himself before the powder-table, in his dressing-gown, to curl his him.
