A Royal Tea-Taster.

The Chinese claim to be the first users of tea as a beverage. How they came to use it is told in a pretty little legend many centuries old. A young nobleman loved the daughson, Blackwood, Emerson and way Co., Ltd., Pope's Furniture Fac- singer, we say, WAIT, COME AND ter of a reigning Sovereign, but, though 'noble,' he was not of sufficiently high rank to be allowed to marry her. She returned his affection, and the pair managed sometimes to exchange glances. Occasionally, too, the young man sent or brought flowers to his lady-love. One day the two met in the palace garden. The gentleman held in his hand a bunch of most beautiful flowers, but because the keen eyes of her attendants were upon her, the lady A collection of valuable furs that did not take it. > either by mistake or intentionally drank some of the water in which she had placed the twig. It had such a pleasant flavor that the girl, curious to find out whether the leaves and stalk had the same taste, nibbled at them., They were not quite so nice as the water was. That was so very good that every day thereafter the princess had twigs and leaves of the same kind brought to her, of which she made tea. For those twigs came from the tea-tree. The princess having set the fashion of tea-drinking, her example, of course, was followed by all the Court ladies. The custom of drinking tea spread over the entire kingdom, and in course of time over many other countries as well, until the Chinese tea-trade became (as it is to-day) one of the largest businesses

Several prominent furriers on the Pacific Coast loaned the choicest specimens from their stocks for these scenes. Some of the loads which the Indians carry upon their backs are worth into six figures.

"Behold My Wife" is the story of an Indian girl, whom a rich young Englishman, in a moment of drunken rage against his family, married to disgrace them, and how she turned the tables upon him. Mabel Julienne Scott plays the role of the heroine, Atmosphere in George Melford Pic- and Milton Sills and Elliott Dexter are also in the cast. Frank Condon adapted the story to the screen.
