CHAPTER XXXVI.

The house was bazing with light, every window bright with it. Mrs. Cray loved pomp and vanity in all their forms, and she generally caused her rooms to be lighted with the first glimmer of twilight. Mark Cray stelphed into his handsome hall and was received by a couple of footmen. Fling in his hat to one, his gloves to another, he hounded upstairs to his dressingroom, conclust that he was keeping the dinner and his guests waiting. A SLIGHT CHECK.

ing his hat to one, his gloves to another, he bounded upstairs to his dressing com, conclous that he was keeping the dinner and his guests waiting.

Did Mark Cray ever cast sigh of regret to the quiet life at Hallingham, when he and his wife used to sit down to mutton outlets and a pudding and think the fare good moment? Not yet. Dress and dinners and expense of all sorts bring a fascination with them all too enthralling to the senses. How they pall upon the wearied spirit in time, how they deaden the heart and debase the intellect, let those answer who have become their slaves; but Mark Cray and his wife had not reached that period of weariness yet. You may be very sure, knowing what you do know of the world and the generality of people who populate it, that Mr. and Mrs. Cray wanted not for what is called society. The great projector of the Great Wheal Bang Company, holding in his own hands the power to make others rich, was not likely to lack adulation in his private capacity any more than in his publicate, and he and his wife drank their fill of it. Mark's mind was shallow and his head loerably empty, but he was sufficiently altractive in manners to win his way in society, even without the adjunct just mentioned. Mark was looked upon as a gentleman also; for it had somehow got reported the he was a naphew of the proud baronat of Thorndyke. Perhaps it may be forgiven to poor empty-headed Mark that he held his tongue from contradicting it, and suffered the world to think he was of the family of that great man. As to Caroliue, people were in love with her beauty and her youth, and the costly extravagances of the house in Grosvenor Place bore their own charm. Altogether, more guests crowded the doors could always hold. Many satellites of the great world, of a position far above the real one of Mark Cray and his wife, flocked to pay them court; and neither of them was enough to see how unuitable are extremes, or to discern that the acquaintance would never have been condescended to, but that Mark was the femile a board; on the contrary, it would have been a marked circumstance now had he and his wife dined alone.

Mark washed his hands and hurried on his coat, and in a few minutes was this dinnertable, his guests on either side of him. One guest at it, Mark could only regard with natonishment, and that was Miss Davenal. Not that Miss Davenal was not fit to grace a dinner-table, no lady more so at her age in the three kingdoms; but she had so resolutely abstained from honoring Mark's house with her presence, that he had never expected to see her in it again. Caroline said she should invite her and Sara to meet their old friends the Fords, and Mark had laughed when he heard it, "She'll never come," he said; "you might as well ask the lioness from the Zoological Gardens." However, here she was; she had chosen to come. She sat on Mark's left hand, her delicate features quite beautiful in their refinement; Miss Ford was on his right, a shrinking little woman of 40 years; Miss Mary Ford and Sara Davenal were lower down, and the physician, a little, red-faced, thin man, who talked incessantly and wore nankin pantaloons, was next to Caroline. "Put a knife and fork for Mr. Barker had not made his servants; but Mr. Barker had not made his spearance yot. Those were all the guests.

There is something false about Caroline to-day. Look at her dress! It is white watered silk, gleaming with richness, as the dew drops are gleaming in the white crape to the control of the control o maid, taking the girl a whole afternoon to do it, has been added as a motive. Caroline in her evening dress had long put off the mourning for her good uncle, her more than father, dead though he had been but four menths yet; but she is to-day a little ashamed of her hasts, and she has assumed these black ribbons before these Hallingham friends and her Aunt Bettina, to make believe that she still wears it. Her violet eyes are intensely bright, and her cheeks glow with their sweetest and softest of carnine. Sara wears a black crape robe, a little edging of white only on its low body and sleeves, and she wears no ornament, except the jet beads on her neck and arms. class ille; and also them.

But she knew better than to mar the meeting with any unpleasant reproaches of foreboding them, and she was as cordialand chatty as her deafness allowed. It was a roal pleasure to meet Hallingham friends, and Miss Bettine onjoyed herself more than she had ever done since the doctor's 'each, and Caroline marshaled her guests to the glittering drawing room; glittering with its mirrors, its chandellers, and the many lights from its glided girandoles. Dr. Ford and Mark followed shortly, and found them drinking coffee. Caroline and Sara were stealing a minute's private chat together; they had lived apart of late.

"How did you get my aunt to come?"

"I am a sadly busy man," was his answer. "Offending, I fear some of my best friends through not visiting them. But I can scarcely dare to call my time my own."

"Out of town do you say? Woll that is an excuse of course. Sara's here's Mr. Oswald Cray; you used to know him in Hallingham."

The blushes tingled on her cheeks as Mr. Oswald Cray touched her hand. Tingled at the thought that it was not the first time that they had met that day.

I used various domestic remedies and applied to my family physician, but received no benefit. By this time my trouble assumed the form of dropsy. The Western Fair Board has realized the importance of the interests focused in cycling. At its meeting yesterday afternoon the proposal of the London Bicycle Club's representatives—Mr. Percy Caroll, Dr. J. Balfour and Dr. C. W. Belton—to construct a cinder track in connection with the fair, was received by the members present with cordial approval.

Mr. Carroll said that the object of the committee's attendance was to ascertain whether the board would be willing to aid financially an enterprise which had been often broached, but never realized. He would like to hear what the board was prepared to do.

Capt. Porte, who presided, wanted to know whether the wheelmen had not some definite plan regarding the project.

Mr. Carroll said that the club to which he belonged thought of attempting to secure a bonus of $1,000 equally divided between the board and the city council. He was of the opinion that an excellent track could be procured for $1,300. The bicyclists would be willing to contribute enough to make up the amount mentioned.

Col. Gartshore asked who would have the regulation of the track when it was instituted.

Interligible instituted.

Mr. Carroll believed that the bicyclists should have control; that they should have the repairs and running of the track under their supervision, as they were the persons most interested in its preservation and condition.

Mr. Thomas A. Browne maintained that the board should assume management. The board already had a superintendent of grounds and his duties could easily be enlarged without any material expense being incurred.

being incurred.

Ald. Welford observed that the bicyclists should start a subscription in aid of the scheme. He thought if they would do this, very little aid would need to be sought from the board. Three thousand dollars could easily be obtained in such a way, and the long desired athletic grounds might then be established.

Mr. Carroll remarked that as far as the expense was concerned, the board should not demur. Five hundred dollars would be readily realizable from a single meet. The board could inaugurate both their fair and the track this fall, and indemnify themselves twice over for the present outlay.

Dr. Balfour said that a bicycle track would be of great value to the city in bringing outsiders within its precincts. The bicyclists had to have a track, and this would be the last time the board would be asked to move in the matter.

Capt. Porte expressed himself as entirely favorable—to the proposition. There were, however several difficulties which would have to be solved before a satisfactory outcome of the suggestion could be effected. He was entirely in favor of the board doing anything in its power to forward a desirable and beneficial pastime.

Mr. George Taylor moved, seconded by Ald. J. Welford, "that the proposition of a bicycle track at Queen's Park be approved of by the board, and that the proposition of a bicycle track at Queen's Park be approved of by the board and that the proposition be referred to the executive to conbeing incurred.

Mr. Carroll then thanked the board for the favorable consideration which had been accorded the views of the wheelmen, and hoped that a speedy and successful realization of the scheme would be reached.

LOVED A LITTLE GIRL.

A Man of 57 Infatuated With a Child

AUBURN, July 20.—Edward Wilson's attempt at murder and suicide on Monday was a preconceived plan, and one of the strangest cases of insane infatuation on record is also brought to light by letters found upon his person. His age was 57 years, and he was enamored of his landlady's daughter, Maude Smith, aged 7 years. It is thought he went to the boarding-house to kill Maude and then himself, but he was driven away after firing one shot and then made the attempt on the life of Seals, the marble-cutter, who he claimed had ruined his life by coming between him and his darling Maude.

and his darling Maude.

A letter found on his person betrays an over-mastering passion for the young girl.

He said he had been driven from her door He said he had been driven from her door and now did not care to live without his darling Maude. He announced his intention of taking her with him before the great Judge, where they could get justice. He was not afraid to die. He was driven to it, and nobody knew what he had suffered for the past three weeks. He hoped all would forgive him and he bade everybody a long farewell. The letter was signed by his full name and addressed to a friend in this city.
