Capt. Carruthers, in the course of an interview, went into the matter of signaling in an interesting manner. He said the militia department were anxious to introduce it throughout the country, their idea being to first instruct the permanent corps. He had just been at Kingston, where the Royal Canadian Field Artillery had had a two months' course, and a course would be now started at regimental depot No. 1 here. By this systematic instruction of the permanent corps it was thought that men would be trained so that other instructors could be secured and attached later to the militia, the intention of the department being to extend the system o the entire military force of Canada.

Capt. Carruthers spoke of South Africa as an instance where signaling was necessary, saying that a means of communication between a general and his staff was needed just as much as business houses in this city needed a sys-tem of telephony and telegraphy. When an army was landed and a place made more noticed. As a result the department had decided to have a thorough the base of operations, the commercial means of communication were first ways, but a great deal depended upon the enemy, and when the railways were left then other means had to be used. Then came the engineers to lay the tel ephone and telegraph cables, could be laid very quickly, and afforded communication from one part of the country to another. Where, however, the enemy were in a position to cut off this means of communication, anothe means had to be used, and this was the "visual signaling," or the flags, lamps and heliographs. The use of the helio graph will be explained at the class here, as well as the other forms of signaling. Telegraphy and telephony were no under the instructor of signaling, being under the engineer's department, but Capt. Carruthers gave it to be understood that instructors had recently come from England, and would soon start classes in Canada.
