The legends tell other things that go to show how she loved animals, and they obeyed her, as they did our first parents in Paradise, and others of the saints we read of. A wild boar escaping from the hunters took refuge among her swine one day. She blessed him, and he stayed there ever after. So a flock of wild ducks came at her call, and quacked their salutations around her; and even a wolf once leaped into her chariot and allowed her to pat his shaggy head. Some of these stories may be but stories; at any rate they show what the people chought of the holiness of the Virgin of Kildare. St. Briyid's life was mainly a public one, as I shall explain later on. and we have but scant account of the internal affairs of her convent. At one time, when she am her sisters found themselves in another convent on Holy Thursday, we read that St. Brivid herself astonished, and recognizing God's work took the task of washing, the feet of those in favor of St. Briyid, readily granted the favor she had come to ask. He ascribed this to the power of Briyid with God, and invited her to help self, so Patrick's own see, for the names she and her now to she and given hear. So and here as of she and her nuns took each one a sack of t in the following exquisitely beautiful nar-portant work of religious instruction. It was St. Vincent de Pau', the Apostic of Charity and the founder of the sisters of that name, that, in 1630, first broke down the iron barriers and stone walls that separated the nuns from the people, who were famishing for want of their wordand their presence, and allowed the Godgiven companion of man, to take her proper place at the side of the priestly messenger of Christ. Briyid, therefore, travelled a great deal, being invited by the bishops, successors to St. Patrick, to found convent- in their respective dioceses. In spite, however, of the war-troubled character of the times she nor her companions ever met with disrespect. It is true that it could not a be said of them, as it was of that onwho tested the virtue of Erin in the days of Brian :

"Rich and rare were the gents she wore, And a bright gold ring on her wand she bore";

but they went without escort, clad only in the armor of innocence, and recognized by their dress as consecrated virgins of the Lord; and no Irishman, s. cing | them, thought of aught else but the honor and blessing derived from their visit to his native place. The saint thus Acts xviii. 18, 26: "Int Paul, when he had staved yet many days, taking his leave of the brethren, satied thence into Syria, and with him Priscilla and Aquilla. Now a certain Jew, numed Apollo, born at Alexandria, an elequent man, came to Ephesus, one mighty in the Seriptures. This man therefore began to speak bodily in the synagosques. They tell of now once, when she was going along the road with her companions, an insune man met them and alarmed the sisters a good deal. But Brividgoing forward, said to him: "O man! nounce to us the word of God." The mad-man at once made answer: "O holy Briyid I obey thee. Love God, and all will love thee; honor God, and all will honor thee; fear God, and all will fear thee." Brivid, like all the children of Erin, as the French chronicler before quoted says, delighted in music. Now, the barp was found in every comfortable house, and the stranger who could play on it was sure of a double welcome. One day, going into the house of a chief to obtain the release of a captive, while waiting for him to come in, she asked that some one should give them a little music. Those present all asserting their want of ability, one of the nuns said to a boy; "Go and ask Mother Brivid to bless your hands, and then you'll be able sorry slear sister." he arswered, 'loa' I fear I have hardly any for mysell.

So we have passed in review the records of St. Briyid's career. I have omitted most of the wonders that are found in it, because I think they are its least wonderful part. When a person from childhood up always walks in the presence of God, and, so different from the great majority of us, tries to do his pleasure in every thought, word, and deed, what else should we expect than that God should favor such a one, shower his choicest gifts upon her, and make all nature obedient to her will, united, as it nature obedient to her will united, as it always was, with his own.
