Local fresh fish wholesalers and fishermen have traditionally supplied the majority of lobster in fresh, previously boiled form. When North American cooked frozen lobster, which soon became known as "Canadian" lobster was introduced, it proved an excellent complement to fresh lobster. This hold true not only for individual customers, but also for restaurants, because it is less perishable and available at lower prices. Moreover, because of its long shelf life, cooked frozen lobster can be distributed on a nation-wide basis, reaching remote areas far away from major shopping centres and/or fresh fish stores. Swedish consumers, except those close to the Swedish west coast, are not likely to become accustomed to buying and/or handling live lobster. With this pattern, follows a general disinterest among local restaurants in installing holding tanks for receiving live lobster. Sweden exports negligible amounts of lobster, with total exports at only 19 tonnes in 1993 valued at kr$865,000. Swedish exports of lobster products are almost entirely destined for Finland, 71.4% in 1992.

Sweden is a modest importer of lobster products, with a total of 516 tonnes in 1993 valued at kr$35.3 million. Swedish importers and wholesalers should be targeted for live lobster sales, and these firms have shown a growing interest in sourcing live lobster in North America. These lobster products, when boiled, are then sold fresh at prices around SEK$200, while locally caught products command a higher price of SEK$298 and up per kilogram. Imports into Sweden during 1993 were sourced almost entirely from Canada and the United States, with minimal quantities sourced in Norway.

Nation-wide distribution in Sweden of whole lobster frozen in brine is to retail chains, independent grocery stores, restaurants, and the catering sector. Lobster meat, frozen has national distribution primarily to restaurants and the catering trade, with a minimal amount absorbed by retail stores. As for live lobster, seafood wholesalers bring in lobster, and boil them for distribution to restaurants and fresh fish retail stores. Also, Swedish importers deliver lobster to fish wholesalers for processing {cooking} and distribution. Insignificant volumes of live lobster are sold direct to restaurants, and generally on an adhoc basis. Live lobster products from North America, whether Canadian or American, have entered the Swedish market as substitutes and complements to the limited supply of local or Norwegian lobster. Imported products are priced accordingly by the local Swedish trade, giving Nordic lobster a premium price.
