FRENCH DROUGHT BROKEN.

Paris, June 24.—The drought which has been afflicting Paris and virtually all France for several weeks, seems to have been broken. Rain began falling here this morning.

DIARY OF A FASHION MODEL

BY GRACE THORNCLIFFE.

She Discusses the Square Neckline That's Becoming To the Slender Throat.

I saw a lovely afternoon gown at your wonderful opening, Mme. Francis. It was a combination of black chiffon and midnight blue charmeuse."

"Oh, yes, I know the gown you mean," Madame replied. "I will have it shown immediately."

The frock to which Mrs. Conroy referred is lovely, and we have had a great many orders for it, because the color combination of midnight blue and black is always popular, and both these shades are so durable. Madame nodded to me to show this dress, and when I came out Mrs. Conroy said:

"That is one of your lovely gowns that stuck in my memory. I like the lines and the coloring so much. The square neck is becoming to me because my face is slender, and that knife pleating of lace around the collar is very softening.

That neckline is one of the reasons this gown appeals to me so strongly."

"That neckline is very becoming to a slender throat and face," Madame agreed. "The lines of the bodice are also effective on a slender figure. This model is correct for you in every detail."

"I think so, too, Madame. I like the knife-plaited insert of crepe chiffon and the plaited skirt of that material. To me this crinkly chiffon is the coolest fabric I know."

"It is delightfully cool," Madame replied, "and this materials in the lighter tones of pink, green and yellow makes wonderfully lovely summer evening gowns."

"Oh, yes, the dinner gown of yellow chiffon with trimmings of ecru lace you showed at the opening was lovely," said Mrs. Conroy. "The slip worn beneath this dress is black charmeuse, isn't it, Madame?" she inquired.

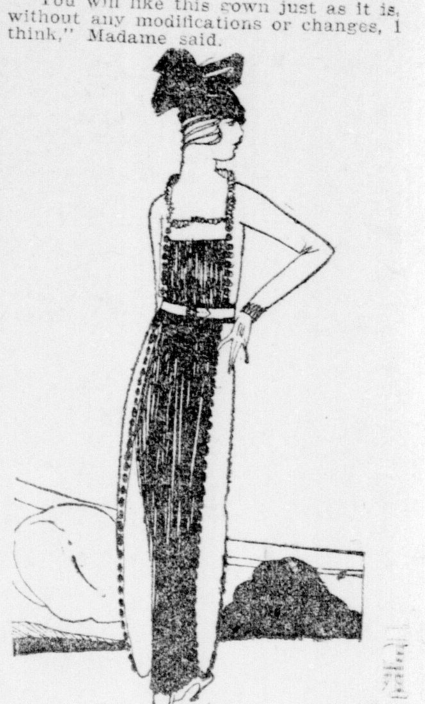

"Yes, this slip is black charmeuse, but black net or georgette crepe might be substituted and you would possibly find the thinner lining cooler. However, the charmeuse slip obviates the necessity for wearing any petticoat, so it's just as cool in the long run," Madame said.

"Would you advise a flesh-colored charmeuse slip?" inquired Mrs. Conroy.

"A flesh-colored charmeuse slip would be effective and would lift the tone of the gown to a decidedly lighter effect, but I prefer the combination of dead black and mightnight blue."

"Doubtless you're right, Madame. These long panels of midnight blue charmeuse are quite effective, and I like their facing of black chiffon," Mrs. Conroy remarked.

"You will like this gown just as it is, without any modifications or changes, I think," Madame said.

This Smart Afternoon Gown Shows Blue Charmeuse Panels.

"I'm sure I will, Madame, but a woman likes to consider a new gown from every possible angle before she can feel sure of being ultimately satisfied with her choice. However, I always come to grief when I try to 'gild the lily,'" Mrs. Conroy said. "I think those rows of black bone buttons are very effective," she continued. "Now, I should like to try on that hat, because it goes so well with this dress."

This hat, which is made of black high lustre satin, and is trimmed with a huge bow of satin, faced with blue straw, was particularly becoming to her and she ordered it to wear with this gown.

MY HEART AND MY HUSBAND

ADELE GARRISON'S NEW PHASE OF

REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

What Mrs. Stockbridge Begged of Madge.

"I believe Mr. Stockbridge bought that desk himself," Miss Ackerson said slowly.

Milly Stockbridge tossed her head in angry surprise.

"Well, upon my word!" she exclaimed. "He never— No wonder—"

She bit off both attempted sentences as if she were snapping thread with her strong, white teeth. I could have finished both of them, for I knew that she had begun to say: "He never told me about this. No wonder he forbade my coming here."

For the fact that Mrs. Stockbridge was banned from the schoolhouse was known to the older teachers and to me through Alice Holcombe. That Miss Ackerson knew it, I was sure, although I doubted her knowledge of the real secret underlying the prohibition. That she dreaded Mrs. Stockbridge's reception of the information she had just given her, I knew also from her pallor and the nervous manner in which she fumbled with the papers before her.

The principal's wife stooped to the right-hand drawers of the desk, pulled at them in succession unavailingly.

"No Doubt."

"Does he keep this locked all the time?" she demanded, turning to me with strong suspicion in her voice.

"I really know nothing about it, Mrs. Stockbridge," I returned with untoward carelessness. "I once saw Mr. Stockbridge file away some school records in those drawers upon the other side. I suppose he has stored other school papers upon this side. I heard Miss Holcombe once say that before he bought this desk the office was so full of papers that you couldn't find a place to sit down. I believe Mr. Stockbridge tried to get the board to buy another desk, and finally in despair at their delay bought one himself."

I had the sense of hurrying breathlessly to catch a train as I talked in the wild attempt to divert her suspicion. The next sensation was that of seeing the last car disappear in the distance as Mrs. Stockbridge turned her face toward me with a palpable sneer.

"No doubt," she drawled.

Keen Interest.

Then for two minutes that seemed endless she stood with one hand resting upon the desk and her eyes restlessly travelling over the office. I expected an explosion of some sort, but, to my surprise, at the end of her inspection she turned to me, speaking brusquely, it is true, but without the excited rancour I had expected.

"Well, we might as well get upstairs," she said. "Will you take this cake?"

I thankfully accepted the bundle she put into my hands, did my best not only in the interval before the other teachers came into the rest room, but during the impromptu luncheon to keep the conversation in safe channels.

To do our guest justice she evidently made a determined effort to forget the thoughts that were troubling her, and to appear in a natural, friendly manner. But that she was preoccupied, all of us could see.

Once she roused to interest when I took from the canister in which I had put the tea I had brought from home three packets of the tea and deposited them in the three teapots which our menage boasted.

"Oh!" she exclaimed, as I poured the boiling water over the packets—"that's the tea I've heard about. I've meant to get it so many times. How many cups does a packet make?"

"The directions say three," I replied. "But we can squeeze five good cups from the pot usually."

"Do you mind my looking at some of them?" she asked.

"Of course," I returned cordially, bringing the canister and turning the packets out for her inspection. She looked at them with such interest that I felt a hospitable impulse.

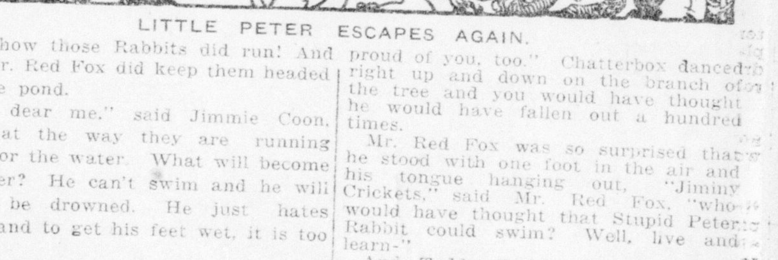

"Wouldn't you like to try some of them," I said. "I can easily bring more from home if you will take these."

"Oh, thank you!" she said, with a child's pleased interest. "May I have three?"

"All of them if you like," I returned. "I can bring some more tomorrow morning."

"Oh, no, three will be loads," she returned. "I'll just surprise Kenny with a new kind of tea tonight."

I wrapped the packets carefully, and she put them away in her handbag. The gift seemed to put her in a better humor, and for the rest of the luncheon she was almost gay.

LITTLE PETER ESCAPES AGAIN.

My how those Rabbits did run! And how Mr. Red Fox did keep them headed for the pond.

"Oh dear me," said Jimmie Coon, "look at the way they are running right for the water. What will become of Peter? He can't swim and he will surely be drowned. He just hates water and to get his feet wet, it is too bad!"

Now it was Teddy Possum's time to laugh. He shouted out to Jimmie Coon, "What difference does it make if he does get his feet wet, if he is drowned?"

Jimmie Coon paid no attention to such a silly remark. He was dreadfully worried about little Peter. "Never again will I take Peter away from home and promise his mother to see him safely back to her. No Sir-ee—it is too big a job for me!"

Peter Rabbit was running just as fast as he could and they soon came near the pond. One by one the Snow Shoe Rabbits took to the water and swam like ducks right across to a small island in the middle of the pond.

Peter looked right and left. Mr. Fox could have caught him without much trouble. It looked just as if he wanted to make him try and swim and then laugh and pull him out.

My it was an exciting time and all the Snow Shoe Rabbits who were safe on the island called out to Peter to take to the water and shouted they would help him across.

Two Snow Shoe Rabbits were on the bank and they waited for little Peter. Jimmie Coon nearly fell out of the tree he was in when he saw Peter as brave as any Snow Shoe Rabbit! He plunged right in. The water was cold for there was a little ice around the edges of the pond.

Jimmie Coon stood right up in the crotch of the tree, and shouted to Peter, "Good for you Peter, I am proud of you, there isn't any thing you can't do! I declare you can swim as fast as any Snow Shoe Rabbit."

Teddy Possum yelled at him, too, "Peter, you are a great sport. I am proud of you, too." Chatterbox danced right up and down on the branch of the tree and you would have thought he would have fallen out a hundred times.

Mr. Red Fox was so surprised that he stood with one foot in the air and his tongue hanging out. "Jiminy Crickets," said Mr. Red Fox, "who would have thought that Stupid Peter Rabbit could swim? Well, live and learn-"

And Teddy Possum swinging from the branch of a tree swung right up against Mr. Fox and tumbled him over. My how those rabbits laughed and how quickly Mr. Red Fox turned and ran. He called back that his children were expecting him home.

Tomorrow—Jimmie's Word Doubted.

To-morrow's HOROSCOPE

By Genevieve Kemble

THURSDAY, JUNE 26.

The planetary prospects for this day are of a more exhilarating and encouraging nature, with auguries for advantage and progress, provided the wayward and impulsive conduct incited by an adverse Lunar transit of Mars be tempered by cool and responsible action. Avoid possibilities for disputes and litigation, shunning all rashness and hasty speech. Domestic, affectional, social and artistic matters are under a splendid Venus vibration, and should bring pleasure as well as profit, though prodigality in pursuit of these should be exercised. Benefits should accrue from unusual sources or individuals, or through peculiar experiences.

Those whose birthday it is should have a successful year if they manage their affairs with restraint and good judgment, avoiding quarrels, law and accident. Their domestic and social affairs should prosper. A child born on this day, while affectionate, romantic and fortunate, may be rash, impulsive, extravagant and indiscreet.
