I have often thought that it was only a question regarded in the manufacture and sale at wholesale of boots the commission refeated a motion of Admiral Beaumont (Great Britan), blamming the Russian crews. If they took be shipped more cheaply from that the view that he was sincere in his conviction, his action, deplorable as it was, would be reduced from a wilful and wanton outrage to at the worst a grave error of judgment. It is said that the board will give no opinion on the question of the presence or absence of Japanese torpedo beats in the North Sea, but the later despatch asserts that the commission will free all navies from the imputation that torpedo boats were present. If this be so it necessarily follows that Rojestvensky's belief in their presence even if sincere was totally unfounded. This is the crux of the whole situation and should the commission find even by implication that there were no tor pedo boats present, they or a majority of them may whitewash the Russian admiral as they please, but he wil certainly stand condemned as an officer absolutely unfitted for the position he held. Altogether the crisis was a very difficult and delicate one for the British cabinet to face, and whatever be organs.
