POETRY.

Wishing for Spring-Time.

BY HARRIET J. MEEK.

Jam weary of the tuneless time, The reign of ice and thrall; The halls of pearl, the floors of rime, The court, the king, and all! I long to see the sunny hours Dance to the smile of May and flowers; And these cold hills put on her plume, With eyes of life and brows of bloom.

I am weary all, with wishing To see a wild-bird's wing; Of longing for the palest leaf, The faintest breath of Spring. For these rude rocks, where storms are nursed, Will bear her dainty foot-prints first; And frown amid the fairest charms. That blossom in her dewy arms.

I long to see the shadows gray Through odorous valleys grouping, When o'er the dreamy cheek of Day The purple tringe is drooping; And the curled waters catch the glow That sleeps above, and smiles below, Till stars forget that heaven is bright, While gazing on the earth of light.

Tis well, when skies are sunless, And gloom is on the hill, We have Hope's dear world of lite at heart, That winter cannot chill! Fair Hope! that breathes the summer-bloom, Ere pulseless Nature leaves the tomb;

Pour early muric through her areatus. The breeze that drinks the odor-tide, E'en now is on the wing-The gloom that was a the mountain side Is passing while I sing; Through every clicit of storm I trace A smile to fact o'er's thing i's face,

And in the darks tright I see Some promise or the days to be!

While far-off strains and happy streams
