FLOOD PREVENTION

The above important matter is only agitating the people of Brantford, Paris, Galt and other places the banks of the Grand River, but is also deeply agitating the people of Mississippi.

The name, in the Indian language means "Father of Waters."

The State borders four hundred miles on the mighty Mississippi River which has many tributary streams and the whole lot, from time immemorial, have had a habit of going a rampage at least once, and often twice, a year. The total damage been enormous, and also the loss of life. Vast sums have been expended on levees (in other words, embankments) and in other directions, as in the case of the Grand, each records more far-reaching inundations than ever before.

Ex-President Roosevelt has taken up the matter, and with characteristic vigor he is writing on the subject the "Outlook," the paper of which is one of the editors.

The Colonel states that he has seen, first and last, a great deal of it and thought to forests, rivers, water-powers, and has views which may be useful about the prevention of floods in the tributary valley of the Mississippi. He thinks such floods can be prevented. There was an overflow last spring, further trouble in January, and again in March. He says that it is necessary—

1. To treat the Mississippi as a unit with all its tributaries for source to mouth.
2. The Federal Government bring the levee system up to standard for its entire length and maintain it.
3. To secure further protection adequate restraints (sheathing) that the banks will not lose earth cave in.
4. To supplement the levee system by some plan of source stream control which would serve to lower crest of the floods in the Mississippi valley, and thereby relieve the pressure on the levees.

He realizes that the entire thing would prove a big and expensive carry out, but not nearly so expensive as the floods have come to be.

MORGAN'S WILL

The confession of faith with multi-millionaire Morgan preface will, exemplifies a beautiful and questioning belief in the Divine, of salvation.

It is now very evident that many lavish gifts on behalf of Anglican church, to which he longed, were not in any sense stowed in a spirit of ostentation, from the heart.

Here was a man with the wealth of a Croesus with art treasures of gold value, with palatial residences and with a monetary power enabled him to be a factor not in the financial circles of the United States but also of the world.

And yet his first thought when he undertook the solemn responsibility of leaving what comes to all of us, not of them, but of the expression a simple faith first of all in the reign of the King of Kings, then of the atoning power of Blessed Saviour.

Amid it all he left no more precious thing than that message.
