But the militarista are not logical; they are not even fairly good at com-mon arithmetic. The cost of one Dreadnought is but a small part of the insurance premiums which they consider necessary to insure the nation against the possibility of war. In the estima-tion of the British alarmists one hun-dred Dreadnoughts would not constitute an extravagantly large fleet. Wars have become shorter in these days of rapid mobilization and arms of preci-sion. A period of hostilities extending beyond one year would be abnormally long. Two hundred days would prob-ably suffice to fight out an issue be-tween neighboring European nations. At the assumed rate of expenditure a war of this length would cost £200,000,000; and this is exactly the price of one hun-dred Dreadnoughts. The argument of the military insurance agents should therefore read thus: In order to save the remotely possible expenditure of £200,000,000 for writ is necessary to incur the certain expenditure of £200,000. A greenhorn who had never put on a diving suit persuaded the crew of a lighter to let him go below while they were waiting for the regular man to come on duty, and in Motor Boat he gives an account of the experiences like-ly to accompany a first descent of that sort.

I The neavy suit was drawn on, the ends of its legs being the same shape i as rubber boots; the ends of the arms had a deep band of elastic clasping the wrists tightly; the opening at the neck was wide. A pair of brass shoes of about ten pounds each, and similar to a Chinaman's, were slipped on and strap-ped to the enkles; then woollen mit-tens, for it was the latter part of Jan-uary, and then the diver's waterproof mittens, which had long rubber gaunt-lets. When in that position or lying prone the air will sometimes work into the legs; then the body fills and the diver shoots to the surface feet first; he is hauled aboard by the life line and righted and rested.
