The Heir to Beecham Park

CHAPTER XXX.

They had spent the first six months following the earl's death at Beecham Park; then Miss Lawson took Margery abroad before paying a brief visit to the manor. Now she accompanied Lady Court to Waverley, at Margery's own request. Personally, she thought the little village too quiet for the girl, but Margery seemed to like its peaceful monotony, so she raised no objection. As time went on, however, and she found the sad apathy increase, instead of decrease, the governess began to consider how she ought to act.

Stuart had not been mentioned between them for weeks, though Miss Lawson had to send a daily report to the eager, anxious man. Something must be done, she declared, mentally, as she turned to meet Margery entering the room in her heavy black robe and large black hat, to banish the morbid remembrance and sadness that were preying upon the life of the young girl.

"I am glad to see you are sensible," she observed, nodding at sight of the hat. "Now come along; it is a beautiful afternoon."

Margery smiled faintly at the sharp words yet gentle voice, and together they left the house.

They walked on in silence to the very edge of the sea, and stood watching the sunlit-crested waves come rolling in. Margery was deep in thought, and Miss Lawson watched her anxiously. Her heart prompted her to speak out, to urge the girl to cast off her burden of gloom and turn once more to joy and happiness, but the sad young face looking across the sea stopped her.

The afternoon sun descended lower and lower, and still Margery stood gazing at the sea.

"The great sea, faultless as a flow'r, Throws trembling under beam and breeze And laughs with love of th' am'rous hour."

At last, as a gray cloud obscured the golden light for a time, she turned to Miss Lawson.

"Let us go back," she said, hurriedly, with a little shudder. "I am tired now."

Miss Lawson walked with her in silence.

"I am an old woman," she mused to herself, "that is beyond me. We have waited long and wearily, and yet she gets no better. I shall give in, and leave the rest to Stuart."

A message sped swiftly from the fishing village to the great city. It was short, yet it brought a thrill of intense joy to Stuart Crosbie's aching heart. There was no hope breathed in the words, but hope lived within his breast, as it had lived through all his weary waiting. He longed impatiently for the night to be gone—for the morning to come, and when the sun rose over the still sleeping city, he was speeding away from it to the sea.

"Where shall we land you, sweet? On fields of strange men's feet, Or where the fire-flows blow, Or where the flowers of snow, Or flow'rs of foam?"

We are in love's hand to-day."

So sang his heart in glad anticipation of its joy. Happiness had been so long absent, it must come now. Misery, despair, sorrow, were all forgotten—he lived again!

"You will be back to-night?" asked Margery, as she put a waterproof round Miss Lawson's form. "You promise me?"

"I promise," said Miss Lawson, briskly. "Ugh, what a day! Margery, take my advice; don't go out."

"It will not hurt me; I like the wind and the spray."

"Then wrap up well, Pauline," turning to the maid—"If her ladyship does go out, see that she puts on something sensible."

"How little you trust me!" said Margery, with a faint smile. "But are you sensibly clad, may I ask?"

"Liver Trouble so Severe I Had to Quit Work"

Mr. Thomas Honey, Brantford, Ont., writes: "I was a great sufferer from enlargement of the liver for ten months, and finally I had to quit work. I would wake up in the mornings with a bitter taste in my mouth, had frequent headaches, yellow complexion, and pain in my right side, and between the shoulder blades. It was almost unbearable, and terribly weakening. I could not sleep at night and my heart also bothered me. But the whole trouble has now left me, thanks to that wonderful medicine, Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills."

CHAPTER I.

"There isn't a house, except mine, nearer than Peel, and that's three miles away," was the reply. "I won't harbor you. I would sooner welcome the devil himself!"

He had reached a belt of thick firs, about a quarter of a mile from the shore, and, before plunging into them, cried:

"The storm is over. See that glow against the sky yonder? That is caused by the lights of Deal town. Follow it."

So saying, he vanished, and the rustle of his skirts told that he was going at a quick pace.

"Confound the fellow!" muttered Locksley, angrily. "He must be a veritable old savage! Three miles, eh? A pretty guide that is for a stranger to follow! I'll see him hanged first. He shall find me a bed, or I'll know the reason why!"

He entered the belt of trees, and after feeling his way for a hundred yards, saw the dark outline of a square built house, and in several of the windows bright lights were burning.

Boldly advancing to the door, Edmund Locksley knocked on it smartly with his knuckles. In the uncertainty light there was no door-bell to be seen, and he was in no mood to be trifled with. Indeed, he had by this time worked himself into indignant anger, and waited impatiently for some reply to his summons.

Diverted of his oilskins, the old seaman appeared, and behind him the graceful figure of a young girl, a lamp in one hand.

Locksley thought that he had never before seen such a vision of angelic beauty, and the hot words that had already formed themselves on his tongue died away.

"I am sorry to intrude upon you again, sir," he said, simply, "but the night is so dark that I find it impossible to follow the directions you gave me. Let me crave your kind hospitality for a few hours, even if it be only a bed of straw."

Unconsciously his eyes wandered to the face of the girl who was listening to him in wonderment and pity.

"Grandpa," she said, quickly, and the young man thought her tones had the sweetness of silver bells. "Grandpa, ask the gentleman in. You cannot—you must not turn him away. Do you not see that he is hurt—that his hands are covered with blood?"

Locksley started. He was not aware of this, and determined to make the most of it. Yes, his hands were blistered and raw. The skin had been worn away in his terrible efforts to reach land, and presented a gruesome appearance in the flickering light of the lamp.

"Dora, go to your room!" commanded the old seaman. "I will attend to the stranger. Sir," he added, "I am bitterly annoyed by this intrusion; but if you are injured, my man shall take you to Deal in my pony carriage."

"Oh, thank you—thank you," began Locksley.

"Don't thank me," was the sudden interruption. "I make no pretense at hospitality; I do not want you here, and I almost regard your coming as a curse. Nothing could induce me to permit you to remain under my roof one hour, so do not run away with the idea that I shall relent. Come in, and step into yonder room while I order the carriage."

As Locksley obeyed, he saw the seaman's granddaughter flit across the farther end of the passage, and he never forgot the glance that she flashed back at him. For a moment his heart stood still, then bounded into his throat, filled with a delicious kind of joy. There was a mingling of curiosity and compassion in her eyes. It seemed so cruel, so unreasonable of her grandfather to insist that the stranger be sent away when he was wounded, and perhaps ill.

The old man motioned him to a seat at the same time pointing to a side-board containing half a dozen well-filled decanters.

Canadian Fish in Foreign Markets

Dominion Shippers Make Good Impression During Critical Inspection.

LONDON, March 13.—(Can. Press).—A large party of commercial and business men from London, interested in the importation of fish from Canada, to-day visited Newport, Monmouthshire, and inspected the facilities this port has to offer for the development of this trade.

Although the business has as yet only reached the experimental stage, the results are highly encouraging. Six tons of Nova Scotia fish were recently sold at Billingsgate and at Glasgow and in two French markets, the dealers of which, although skeptical at first, afterwards admitted that buyers for the big hotels and stores had been unable to distinguish between the Canadian fish and that ordinarily offered.

Attention has been particularly directed to Newport as an incoming point, by reason of the existence of a large area of covered sheds, now vacant, which adjoin the quays and railways, and which could be readily converted into markets. Ambitious of importers are not confined merely to Canadian fish, but hopes are entertained of introducing Canadian dairy products and meat on a large scale.

A tentative scheme has already been negotiated with the Canadian Government Merchant Marine for chartering steamers.

Among the participants at the inspection at Newport, was Chief Inspector of Fisheries Cowles, of Ottawa, who has just arrived to report on the situation generally.

The Great Western Railway has promised to provide a quick special service from Newport to British marketing centres and the chief continental markets.

Apart from this, a population of ten millions exist within 100 miles radius of Newport. The party returned to London greatly impressed with the opportunities this port offers in this line. One Canadian, a recent arrival here, remarking that he had seen more shipping at Newport, than he had ever beheld at Montreal, though until this time he had never heard of Newport.
