The colored people of Chatham have a grievance. It is this: That they are compelled to send their children from one extreme end of Chatham, past a number of first-class schools, to an inferior school at the other extreme. In some cases this involves a walk of about two miles, and for children of tender years, either in the heat of summer or the sold of winter, is out of the question. They hold that they have a right to admission in these schools, and at a public meeting Wednesday night they resolved to memorialize the proper parties.
