

Later, in 1947, Senator Bradette and I were fellow delegates to the United Nations in New York, where he took an important part in the discussions of Committee One, dealing with the partition of Israel, the Marshall Plan, the Korean Commission, and colour problems in South Africa. His interest in international affairs continued unabated until the end of his life.

In this particular respect our two deceased friends had much in common. Both of them, after the last war, took the opportunity to travel extensively in Europe and to observe at first hand some of the problems which are now concerning us so vitally. Both of our late members will be sorely missed in this chamber, but some consolation remains to us when we remember their example here. Benjamin Disraeli expressed this thought in historic and memorable words in the British House of Commons almost a century ago in speaking to a resolution of condolence upon the passing of Richard Cobden. John Morley, in his Life of Cobden, quotes Disraeli's tribute which is not inappropriate in its application here today and which, in conclusion to my inadequate remarks, I should like to repeat:

These great men are not altogether lost to us, in that their words will be often quoted in this house, in that their example will often be referred to and appealed to, and in that even their expressions may form a part of our discussions. There are indeed some members of Parliament who, though they may not be present, are still members of this House, are independent of dissolution, of the caprices of constituencies, and even of the course of time.

One ventures to think that our late colleagues belong to such distinguished company. I wish to extend most sincere words of sympathy to the surviving members of both families.

Hon. A. B. Baird: Honourable senators, I feel that had Senator Euler been here today and listened to these eulogistic remarks he would have said, "Who is this man? I do not know him." It has been said that you have to live with a person in order to know him. Well, I have not lived with Senator Euler, but I shared the same office with him for thirteen years, and I think I got to know him during that time. He was one of the most intellectual and finest men I have had the good fortune to meet. I believe he could be termed one of the great men of Canada.

The last honour that was conferred upon him, I believe, was his appointment as Chancellor of Waterloo Lutheran University. It was a great honour not only to him, but also to the university. He was genuinely pleased to receive the appointment, and I felt it was the crowning glory of his life.

Honourable senators, I extend my sincere sympathy to Senator Euler's son, Max, and to his brother and sister.

Hon. George S. White: Honourable senators, I would like to associate myself with the remarks made by previous speakers who have paid tribute to our late colleagues. I wish to add only a brief word about my friend, Senator Joe Bradette. Our friendship extended over a long period of years. I think it is a tribute to our parliamentary system that two men of different racial origins, language, religion and political faith, should have remained warm personal friends throughout their parliamentary life together. Senator Bradette was of that breed which is liked by everyone. I well remember in the House of Commons the tribute that was paid to him by members of all parties when the Prime Minister of that day proposed his name as Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons. Mr. Bradette filled that high and important position with great ability and dignity. His sense of fairness, his humour, his eloquence, his charming and gracious manner smoothed over many a difficult and troubled period during the war years.

In the passing of Senator Joe Bradette the citizens of Canada and the Parliament of Canada have lost a valuable public servant, one who has made a great contribution to the culture and welfare of this nation, and in this chamber each one of us lost a warm personal friend. I am sure we will remember him as the gentle, kindly man he was. I join with the others who have spoken in extending my sincere sympathy to the families of Senator Bradette and Senator Euler.

Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson: Honourable senators, I make no pretense to add anything to what has already been said in tribute to the late senators. I can only say, having been associated with them for a period of years, that I know their memory will always remain green with us. They will always be looked upon as great Canadians.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, may I point out at this time that the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) is absent from the chamber today to attend the funeral in Cochrane of our deceased colleague, Senator Bradette.

May I also draw to the attention of honourable senators the fact that the junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) is with us again. We all welcome his return after a lengthy illness. I am glad to see that he looks quite fit, and hope that his
