Lieut. Colonel W. E. Roscoe has received another letter from his son—Capt. B. W. Roscoe, who was wounded in action. This letter gives some further particulars which tell of his early return to the front again. His wound was caused by one of Fritz's H. E. shells which exploded too close to do much damage but he was well pasted and shaken up by this, and other shells which wounded him in the arm and slightly injured different parts of his head. Captain Roscoe thinks his march through the danger zone were so many were killed was truly a hell upon earth and a hut one at that.
