The official report of Captain Bourke of the ill-fated Victoria, as published by us yesterday, shows the utter disregard for danger which British seamen possess in the discharge of their duty. After seeing the Camperdown pierce his vessel, and when the Victoria's bow had settled down steadily, Capt Bourke made at tour of inspection. When he was in the starboard flats he heard the order for everyone to go on deck and watched the men around him go up. He visited next the mess deck and went down to the starboard engine room, where he found the engineer, a hero like himself, calmly awaiting the gong signals. Leaving the main deck, the captain looked after the closing of other bulkheads and then returned to the bridge to make his report. He never reached the Admiral,
