THE CHAPERON.

English Society Finds It Cannot Do Without Her.

For two seasons the chaperon in London society of the biggest class found her occupation gone. Boy and girl dances, with the hostess for sole duenna, were the first step to her dismissal, and young womanhood soon found itself almost completely emancipated. It was regarded as quite dowdy to be accompanied in the usual manner of past years by a married friend, who was supposed to have one in her charge during a dance or at the play.

Some mothers were doubtful as to the propriety of this state of things. Others some mothers were doubtful as Others took very kindly to it. After all the lot of the chaperon is not "roses, roses all the way." The society of other chaperons, hints a writer in the Queen, is not invariably found to be stimulating.

But the season just passed has called them into requisition again. Society gave the new plan a fair trial and then gave the new plan a fair trial and then decided to reject it.

Perhaps the chaperon was a little too conscientious in the performance of her duties. Certain it is that she now takes a much lighter view of them. She has learned her lesson.

Her former idea that the girl in her charge should return to her after every or nearly every dance has been corrected. No longer does she need to take up her position in some corner easily accessible to partners and readily discernible by the chaperoned. By the new order of things her mere presence in the house is all that is required. She arranges where she may be found should the girl need her, settles with the latter the hour of going home and then discussed in the presence of the properties of the pro

Last of all, but far from being least, young men prefer the presence of the chaperon. How get rid of a girl after a dance if one cannot take her back to one appointed spot?

The situation had other difficulties. Sitting sort with a charming girl is all very well for half an hour or so, but the amusement if prolonged is apt to lead to risks connected with matrimony by giving a chance to scandal.

All parties being tacitly agreed, then, the chaperon returns to her place, with its few pleasures and its many penalties. Society has discovered that it cannot do without her.
