

The Earl's Mistake

"Carrie, I have done wrong. I admit it. I have committed a grievous sin against you, if you will, in keeping this—this episode of my past life hidden from you, but ask yourself, is there not some excuse?"

"Yes," she says, still with the same unnatural calmness—"yes, you knew that if you had told me what I have learned for myself to-night that I should have refused to be your wife. But," with a wan smile, "would it not have been better in the end, more merciful to me than to have let me go on loving you in ignorance that you had no heart left to give me, until I chanced—chanced—to discover the fact myself. Ah! it was cruel—it was cruel!" and her lips quiver as one tear, one only, rolls down her pale cheek. "I could have borne it then. But now—oh, heaven! and forgetting him, all but her great loss, she covers her face with her hands. "How shall I bear it! How shall I bear these past happy weeks out of my life, and forget them?"

"For the love of heaven, Carrie, be reasonable!" he says, almost fiercely.

"Reasonable! Do not punish me beyond my offence! You know that I love you as surely!"

"As her highness Zenobia knows that you love her!" she breaks in, and the retort crushes him.

"Can you deny it?" she goes on. "Not five minutes ago your lips—she shudders—"would have touched her if I had not been in her place!" and for the first time she gives way and sinks on to the seat, her face covered by her hands.

"Carrie," he murmurs hoarsely, bending over her, "it is a hideous mistake."

He stops short, struck by the remembrance that it is the very phrase he had spoken to Zenobia, and Carrie remembers it, too.

"Yes," she says, shrinking from him. "It was a hideous mistake! Thank Heaven, it is not too late to repair it. If—if you had married me and I had found out what I have discovered to-night, it would have been too late! But now—why, how easy it is; I, Carrie Harrington, have but to step back into my old place, to resume my insignificance, and you can return with a feeling of devout thankfulness to your old love!" She stifles a sob, and looks up at him with a bitter smile. "Yes, so easy that in a short time you, and she, will have forgotten that the mistake happened, and most certainly will have ceased to remember that such a person as I ever existed!"

"Do you wish to drive me mad?" he asks, huskily.

"Mad!" she echoes, with a laugh. "It is I who have been mad ever since I have decided myself into the idea that you could love me. Yes, I was mad that night and forced you to marry me. I, myself, but I am in my right senses now, Lord Cecil, and—I shall never lose them again while I live!"

Silence falls upon her speech. He does not attempt to answer her, but stands moodily speechless. The hand strikes up an inspiring gallop, the sound of which makes dancing mingles with the music, making a hideous discord in Carrie's ear, and beating upon her overstrained brain with withering effect.

He waits a moment or two, then he says, in a low voice:

"I feel that it is vain to try and explain to you, Carrie, you are—forgive me—cruel and unjust to-night. May I write to you to-morrow? May I—eagerly—see you?"

"No," she answers, and the word falls like a knell on his ears. "A hundred letters would avail nothing with me. And—and I pray Heaven that when we part to-night, I may never see you again. And say with greater truth than you did to her highness, 'with a smile you were piteous.' No, Lord Cecil, I am not cruel, nor unjust; I am more merciful to you than you were to me, and in the future you will admit it! From to-night on lives will be far apart; apart; there is little fear that we shall meet again. No, Lord Cecil, I am not world, mine in the little one I feel that we shall not meet, and—and—that thought comforts me."

He pushes his hair from his forehead with a hand trembling with the passion of despair, ay, with remorse, his eyes dwelling on her face, that was never more spiritually beautiful than it is at this moment. Like a man standing helplessly on the ocean's brink and watching a great treasure washed by the pitiless waves out of his reach, he stands and looks down at her.

"What can I say—what can I do?" he murmurs. "I swear that I love you with all my heart and soul, Carrie! That it is you, and you only, for whom I care, and that no shadows of the past can ever fall upon my love for you!"

"And so you prayed that you might never meet her again, because you dreaded lest the old love for her should revive!" she says, turning her eyes upon him. "No Cecil, it has all come upon me like a flash of light. I see my path before me, and I must walk in it. I must be true to myself, and to you. Besides, I look back to this time, the bitterest of other reason, for this one I must be firm; I could not share your love with another woman. All or none I must have, and that, say what you will, you cannot give me."

"Yes, all! all!" he says, eagerly, almost fiercely.

She shakes her head.

"No. You forget that I have heard all that has passed! As surely as that you and I stand here, this woman who just left you will win your heart back, and be your wife."

"No!" he says, sternly.

"As surely," she repeats, with a sigh. "Do not be angry with me, Cecil—"

He smothered an oath, her scorn and indignation were hard to bear, her meekness and gentleness are unendurable.

"It is you who have sinned against me, not I against you! I gave you all my heart and soul, while you—but I will not reproach you! Let us—let us—with a wan smile—"part friends"; is not that the right phrase? Let me, when I look back to this time, the bitterest of all my life, remember that we said no hard words, Cecil, you and I, who have spoken such tender ones, with a quiver of the lips and a glance that nearly drives him mad. Let us have at least that consolation. Good-bye!" and she holds out her hand. "Come! You will not take it!" he says, huskily. "I will not take it," she says, and will not be discarded by you with-have half an hour. I insist! I will do the packing, and arrange everything." To her surprise Carrie obeys, and creeps on to the bed. To Phillip's greater astonishment and relief, she sees the miserable girl fall fast asleep. Mental anguish induces physical exhaustion, thank Heaven! or how could we poor mortals bear the suffering the gods mete out to us in this strange world!

It does not take long to pack; Phillip surveys the locked boxes ruefully, and then summons the maid, gives her the letter, and begs her to order a carriage to take them to the station, murmuring some indistinct explanation; but the servants at the Castle are too well trained to express surprise or ask questions; and the maid goes about her work as calmly as if Phillip had asked her for a bedroom chair.

Phillip waits until the last moment, then goes to the sleeping girl. "Carrie, dear!"

"I will never dance again!" murmurs Carrie, starting up. "Good-bye, Lord Cecil, good-bye! Phillipa, what is it? Ah!"

(To be Continued.)

"I shall never see more clearly, realize more fully that all is over between us, than I do now at this moment," she says, tearfully, for the strain is telling upon her. "Believe me, it were best that you should do so, too."

He is silent a moment, his heart aching, his brain on fire.

"It seems," he says, scarcely knowing what he says, "that you take back your love, that you discard me, without much difficulty, all too easily!"

"If I have sinned against truth are you sure that you have not done so? It seems to cost you so little to get rid of me, that I can almost believe you welcome the excuse. Are you sure that you were as hearty as you asserted when you promised to be my wife?"

"I don't understand," she says, faintly, gazing up at his blazing eyes and knitted brows.

"You smile a mad, desperate smile. 'You forget,' he says, 'that you had a lover and a devoted one; it pauses to take breath; perhaps during these past weeks you have been weighing us in the balance, and have found that after all Willie Fairford is more to be desired than Cecil Neville.'

It is a mad retort, wrung from him in a mood that is madness itself. She looks at him stupidly for a moment, then her face flushes, to grow deadly white again.

His sanity returns in an instant under that mute reproach.

"Carrie, forgive me!" he cries. "I am a fool to doubt you—I was mad to say such a thing! Forgive me!"

And he bends over her.

With a gesture full of wounded love and pride she puts up her hand, then she draws a long breath.

"Yes, I forgive you even that," she says; "but—but there must be no more said between us. Good-bye, Lord Cecil—good-bye, forever!"

In a frenzy of despair he falls on his knee beside her, and tries to detain her. She rises, drawing her arm away from him; and as she does so the tall and graceful figure of Zenobia enters.

Stopping short, she looks at them with a smile that barely hides the jealous rage in her eyes, then murmurs:

"Ah, so sorry! I have interrupted a love scene, a la troubadour."

Lord Cecil springs to his feet, and looks from one woman to the other with a dazed, bewildered expression; but Carrie turns her eyes with a calm, sorrowful gaze upon the half-mocking face of her rival, and then, with an inclination of the head, glides slowly past her into the hall-room.

In the spring the system needs toning up. In the spring to be healthy and strong you must have new blood, just as the trees must have new sap. Nature demands it and without this new blood you will feel weak and languid. You may have twinges of rheumatism or the sharp stabbing pains of neuralgia. Often there are disgusting pimples or eruptions on the skin. In other cases there is merely a feeling of tiredness, and a variable appetite. Any of these are signs that the blood is out of order—that the indoor life of winter has told upon you. What is needed to put you right is a tonic, and in all the world there is no tonic can equal Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. These Pills actually make new, rich, red blood—your greatest need in spring. This new blood drives out disease, clears the skin and makes weak, easily tired men and women and children bright, active and strong. Mrs. J. C. Moses, Brantford, N. S., says: "Last spring my daughter was considerably run down, she was very pale, had no appetite, and became very nervous, and we were alarmed about her. We decided to give her Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and soon after she began taking them there was a decided change. Her color returned, and her whole system seemed to have been built anew. I can warmly recommend Dr. Williams' Pink Pills to all who need a medicine."

Sold by all medicine dealers or by mail at 50 cents a box, or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

THE SEPARATE SCHOOL BILL.

Proposed Amendments Stand Over For a Year.

Price of Separate School Text Books Reduced.

Some Recommendations on Control of Automobiles.

Toronto, April 3.—There will be no amendments to the Separate School Act at the present Legislative session. The Premier announced, at yesterday's sitting, the intention of the Government—acting on the recommendation of the Statute Revision Committee—to submit a stated case to the courts to determine the basis for the distribution of the grant between the public and the separate schools. The issue is as to whether the division shall be regulated according to population, as at present, or as the separate schools claim, according to attendance.

In accordance with this decision Messrs. T. W. McGarry (South Renfrew) and D. Racine (Russell) withdrew their proposed amendments for a year. Twelve months hence they were assured by the Minister of Education, the Government would be in a position to give the whole question the fullest consideration. In the meantime it was the intention of the Government to give relief by providing means of qualification to religious teachers affected by the decision of the Privy Council in the case of the Christian Brothers.

Regarding Mr. Racine's not so separate school pupils' concern their text-books at the same cheap price at which public school books were now being sold, Hon. Mr. Pyne, after conferring with Sir James Whitney, made the important announcement that in arranging for the publication of the new report, new text-books the Government had required from the contractors an agreement to furnish separate school books at the same price as public school text-books. The Government, however, he added, had not control of the issue of separate school books.

In withdrawing his bill Mr. McGarry expressed regret that its introduction had caused adverse comment by certain sections of the community. There was no idea of aggression or aggrandizement on the part of its promoters. Those who criticized did not understand exactly what the bill meant. It represented the sincerely believed to be their right to a share of the taxes from public utility and bonus companies.

A Government bill which was introduced by Hon. Dr. Feaune, under which it is proposed to give the Government power to extend colonization in the north, was on the House taking up in committee the bill with regard to the registration of private detective agencies, attention was drawn to the practice which has existed whereby men appointed as provincial and county judges, and who are connected with private detective agencies and utilized their official position in getting information. The Provincial Treasurer explained that it was the intention of the Government to prevent county and provincial constables acting as private detectives.

Mr. McGarry's bill respecting companies for the improvement of rivers and streams received short shrift, and it was withdrawn.

When the Government's law reform bill was taken up in committee Mr. Wm. Proudfoot (Centre Huron) suggested that perhaps it would be better, in view of the fact that the profession had had but a short time for a session, if the measure stood over for a session.

The Premier reminded the House that last session a strong resolution had been passed, and it had become the Government's duty to bring forward a measure. It might, he concluded, be well to allow certain sections to stand over.

DO YOU BELIEVE THIS?

Do you believe that the personality of a woman is shown by the appearance of the interior of her home? A little reflection will convince you that such is the case. You who have good taste, have you not felt that you were confronted by an almost insurmountable barrier when you have endeavored to make your home reflect the good taste which is within you? We had an instance of this yesterday in the case of a lady who told us she had tried every store in Hamilton in the endeavor to secure something which was the "right" thing for a certain place. She came to us last, and we are proud to say that we were able to send her away satisfied. Next time she will come to us first. Now, all this leads up to what we have to say, which is that we claim that we can, in most cases, give you the right thing in interior home fittings. We refer as well to the small, seemingly "little" details, which really mean so much in carrying out a room or a home in good taste. We invite you to come to us with your problems. Our stocks are now nice, fresh and complete. Will you let us help you?
